> Upon this, he then stated that he would not in any way block my unemployment, and that if I wanted to sometime in the near future I could come [33] Freeland resigned from the Respondent's employ in February 1982 after a dispute with his stepbrothers, Jerry Colvard, the warehouse leadman, and Larry Colvard, another employee. Freeland testified as a witness for the Respondent.

[34] Picazzo testified that on one occasion Williams instructed him to "write [Freeland] up, stating he was suspended." His testimony as to whether or not Williams had told him to suspend Freeland for "one to three days" seemed equivocal.

[35] Freeland testified that, a week or two before the election, Picazzo had warned him about his failure to wear protective goggles on the job as required by plant safety rules telling Freeland that, "because of my record of write-ups that if I didn't watch myself and be sure to do everything right as in wearing goggles that I would be written up and more than likely fired." Freeland added that Picazzo did not issue a warning notice to him on this occasion although Picazzo was aware that Freeland was "an assured no vote against the union."

[36] Moore testified that Freeland had received several warning notices. However, Moore's description of the Respondent's computer printout system regarding the recording of warning notices was somewhat confusing.

[37] Jimenez, the Union's business manager, testified that Picazzo never obtained any employee signatures on authorization cards for the Union except for his own.

[38] The Respondent admits having campaigned against the Union prior to the election.

[39] Picazzo testified that the only time he had any discussions with Moore about his campaigning for the Union was on October 29, 1981. He added that Moore had never mentioned anything to him about his allegedly "campaigning on company time."

back and he would give me a letter of recommendation. He then handed me a check, and then I left.[40]

Picazzo denied that, prior to the election or thereafter, he had threatened any employee with "economic or physical harm" if they told management about his "statements regarding the Union," or if they "did not support the Union." He also denied that Moore had given any reason for his refusal to disclose the names of the employees who had alleged that Picazzo had threatened and intimidated them, more particularly, that the reason for this was that Moore was afraid that Picazzo or his associates would take reprisals against such employees once Picazzo knew who they were. Picazzo testified that Moore gave him no opportunity to respond by way of explanation concerning the allegations against him, and he in turn made no effort to explain anything about this to Moore at the time, because when Moore refused to divulge any information as to the "who, why and when" of his alleged threats and intimidation of employees, Picazzo was at a loss as to what he was supposed to have done. Picazzo added that Moore had never asked him about the conversations he had had with employees during which he allegedly had threatened and intimidated them, these conversations, as discussed hereinafter, having involved Brent Yankee, Larry Colvard, and Mark Freeland.

Moore testified that about 10 days before the Board's election held on November 5, 1981, Jerry Colvard, the warehouse leadman, and Steve Kosiek, a warehouse employee, came to his office and Kosiek told Moore that "Ralph Picazzo was the one that was pushing for the union." Moore stated that Colvard asked him "what can we do about it," and Moore replied, "I don't think we can do anything about it." Moore related that Colvard and Kosiek also said that Picazzo "was campaigning for the union on company time, and that he was the source of the problem." Moore recounted that "Now, what they meant by problem, I don't know . . . . I did not believe it at that time . . . I didn't consider that Ralph was a problem . . . . I kind of figured that the company had been kind of nice to him, and I didn't expect it from him." Moore continued that until he was apprised of this, he was unaware that Picazzo was a union supporter, not knowing "who was pushing the union," and was surprised to find out that Picazzo was the one doing so. Moore added that, during this conversation, neither Colvard nor Kosiek mentioned anything about Picazzo having threatened or intimidated any employees. According to Moore, soon thereafter, approximately a week before the election,

> I approached Ralph and warned him that apparently from the indications I had heard he was campaigning for the union on company time, and told him that I would appreciate it if he would desist or refuse to do that, and he could be subject to dismissal if he continued.[41]

Kosiek denied that, prior to the election, he had gone with Jerry Colvard to Moore's office to complain or report about Picazzo's union activities. However, he did testify that approximately 10 days before the election, he had gone to see Moore about "some questions about the union that I thought he could answer for me." Kosiek stated that Karl Bernsten, the janitor, was present in Moore's office and was upset and complaining about "the hassle that was going on" concerning the question of union representation, and Bernsten was "fed up . . . and ready to just walk out the door, period." He related that Jerry Colvard did appear in Moore's office "momentarily" but had said nothing and left. While Kosiek could not recall what was actually said during this conversation, his testimony strongly implies that he and Bernsten did mention to Moore that Picazzo was campaigning on behalf of the Union, although Picazzo's name was never actually mentioned. Kosiek recounted that they all knew that they were "talking about Ralph." He added that Moore appeared "shocked" about this revelation, and that the conversation lasted "just a few minutes."

Moore related that approximately 3 or 4 days after Colvard and Kosiek had first registered their complaints with him against Picazzo, Colvard again came to see Moore and "reiterated the same claim" regarding Picazzo's continuing to campaign for the Union on company time. He continued, > [Colvard] recorded his concern, hoping that we would not have a union. His indication was that this was not his dominant desire. I basically explained the situation that we had to go through the due process. And that was not enough to satisfy Jerry, he still felt helpless as I did.[42]

Moore seemed a little confused about this conversation.[43] At first he testified that Colvard had said nothing about Picazzo having threatened employees. He then testified that Colvard had told him that

> Ralph has been threatening my people . . . indicating that they should vote for the union, or else . . . that they would have a problem after the union got in . . . . Basically they were told to get on the side of the union. And if they didn't, they would be sorry, because once the union got in they wouldn't have a job.

Moore added that he asked Colvard "where his information was coming from," and Colvard answered, "from Mark [Freeland] and Larry [Colvard]."

[40] At Picazzo's unemployment compensation hearing, the Respondent contested Picazzo's entitlement to compensation on the grounds that Picazzo had been discharged for threatening and intimidating its employees. However, at his hearing the Respondent again did not identify any of the employees who were alleged to have been threatened and intimidated by Picazzo.

[41] Moore stated that Picazzo did not deny this.

[42] Moore testified that Jerry Colvard had indicated to him on a number of occasions his strong feelings "not to have the union voted in."

[43] However, this may have been caused by counsel for General Counsel's use of a time frame to pinpoint when this conversation occurred which appeared to confuse the witness.

Moore testified that he then sought out Larry Colvard and asked him to "tell me first-hand what he had been telling Jerry." Moore stated that Colvard said,

> "He has got me all shook up" . . . that Ralph [Picazzo] had told him that if he did not get on the side of the Union that he was going to have some problems . . . . "What problems he plans, I don't know. I have got enough now."

Moore added that he told Colvard to "take it easy, I think things will turn out all right."

Moore continued that he also spoke to Mark Freeland,

> I asked him what he had been telling Jerry that Ralph had said, I would like to hear it first-hand. I think he asked me what Jerry told me. And I reiterated that . . . . Basically to get on the side of the union or there was going to be a problem. [Freeland] says, "That is what [Picazzo] told me!" I believe Mark said that Ralph would get to him somehow . . . . Well, as best as I recall it had something to do with his job security . . . . He indicated to me that he may not have a job, whichever way the election went.

Moore stated that Colvard and Freeland were "a little bit afraid of losing their jobs," and he told each of them that any discharges of employees required discussion with management before such discharge could be implemented. Moore related that he had spoken to Colvard and Freeland in order to investigate the "rumors" he had been hearing about the plant concerning Picazzo intimidating and threatening employees while campaigning for the Union.[44]

Moore testified that about 3 or 4 days before the election he had another conversation with Picazzo relating to Picazzo's "campaigning for the union on company time, but it was, I guess you would call it a little more heated, because I was annoyed because he was continuing to campaign for the union on company time." Moore related that he told Picazzo,

> "Ralph, we understand you are still campaigning for the union on company time. I request that you discontinue that activity." And I indicated that he would be subject to termination, and that I didn't feel it was right what he was doing.

Moore stated that while he did not tell this to Picazzo, he felt that Picazzo, "as a supervisor," was not obliged to campaign for the Union on company time. He added that Picazzo again offered no response to Moore's accusation.

Moore testified that approximately 2 or 3 days before the election Jerry Colvard came to his office and told him that employee Brent Yankee "has just been threatened, also" by Picazzo.[45] Moore stated that since Yankee did not report this incident to him that day, he called the Respondent's attorney to apprise him of what had occurred whereupon it was decided that Moore would speak to Yankee about this "to confirm the threat." Moore recounted that the following morning, he visited Brent Yankee at his home and asked Yankee to relate what had happened between him and Picazzo the previous day. Moore continued, > Brent said that [Picazzo] approached him indicating some sort of meeting. I forget the context of the meeting. And that [Yankee] should be there, and that if he said anything to anyone about this talk that Ralph and Brent were having that he would kill him—kill Brent . . . . Brent further indicated that when Ralph said this, he turned away for a second, looked back and smiled to see if Ralph was kidding, and [Picazzo] either said, "I'm not kidding," or "I am serious," or words to that effect.

Moore recounted that, at his request, Yankee prepared and executed a written statement of what had occurred between Picazzo and himself, and gave it to Moore, with Yankee telling Moore that "I am afraid to come to work." Moore added that he told Yankee that if he did not feel up to reporting for work that day, he should "call in by the standard procedure," whereupon Moore left Yankee's house. According to Moore he then discussed this whole incident with the Respondent's "general manager in Chicago" and the Respondent's attorney, which resulted in the posting of a security guard during Yankee's shift at the plant.

Moore testified that about 3 or 4 days after the election held on November 5, 1981, Jerry Colvard came to his office and advised him that Picazzo had again threatened employees Mark Freeland and Larry Colvard, telling them "that now that the election had been won, there was going to [be] some fun around here and some heads are going to be busted for those that didn't get on the side of the union." He stated that Bernsten, the janitor, came into his office "a minute or two later," and a third person, whom he could not remember, was "standing virtually in the doorway" when Colvard told him what had occurred. With more particularity Moore recounted that Colvard had stated that Freeland told him that Picazzo had said, "Now that the union is in, those that didn't get . . . on the side of the union, some heads are going to be busted." Moore related that Bernsten, with tears in his eyes, said, "They have got me all shook up and I want to quit," whereupon Moore told Bernsten, "Things will still work out. You will still have a place to work." Moore indicated that Colvard said, "This is a damn shame," and left Moore's office and Moore now offered Bernsten the option of leaving work early since he appeared upset, but Bernsten refused the offer. Moore continued that later that same day he discussed this incident with Ron Williams asking Williams, "What do we [44] Moore testified that he never investigated the circumstances of Picazzo's alleged activities on behalf of the Union, only as to the threats Picazzo was rumored to have made to employees. He added that other than the reports about Picazzo's union activities, he had heard no other "rumors" as to other employees campaigning for the Union or threatening employees at the plant.

[45] Moore testified that he had been told that this "confrontation" occurred while Yankee was "working on his machine" and at approximately 2:30 p.m.

do now, Ron," to which Williams replied, "I don't know." Moore testified that he also spoke to Larry Colvard and Mark Freeland about Picazzo's threat of "heads being busted" and that "they were both fearful of harm, bodily harm." Moore added that after he called his attorney for "consultation," since he felt that Picazzo should now be terminated, he then made a final decision to discharge Picazzo while at home on the "evening of November the 9th" 1981.

Moore testified that he discharged Picazzo on November 10, 1981. Moore related that Picazzo was called to his office about 2:15 in the afternoon and, with Williams also present, he told Picazzo, > Inasmuch as you have continued to push for the union on company time and threatened and coerced employees, we find it necessary to terminate you at this time.

Moore stated that Picazzo responded, "I have been expecting it." Moore related that he now told Picazzo,

> I am sorry it turned out this way. I hope you will understand my position. I indicated also that I would do nothing to stand in the way of his unemployment, and also volunteered a letter of recommendation, if he felt it was necessary at any time.

Moore continued that he presented Picazzo with his final check and Picazzo then left his office. Moore added that Picazzo was an efficient employee with above-average technical and mechanical ability, an excellent attendance and punctuality record, and with work habits "well above average." Moore maintained that the Respondent would not have discharged Picazzo had he merely been campaigning for the Union, but did so because Picazzo had threatened and intimidated employees. Moreover, Moore admitted that after learning of Picazzo's union activities, he did not issue any directives precluding supervisors from campaigning for or against the Union during working hours, nor did he at management meetings with supervisors direct them not to do this.

Brent Yankee, a witness for the Respondent and employed by the Respondent as a machine operator, testified that 3 or 4 days before the election Ralph Picazzo, the day-shift leadman, approached him while he was working at his roll forming machine and said, "You know, the union is trying to get in," to which Yankee responded that he knew about this but that no one had discussed the Union with him or invited him to attend any union meetings.[46] Yankee stated that Picazzo said that "he was wondering . . . what way I was going to be voting." Yankee continued,

> And he just started telling me that it would be better to vote for the union. We would be getting some benefits, but I wouldn't know until after we voted. He said, "We'll have a meeting after you vote." . . . he went into detail on telling me, you know, that he couldn't tell me the benefits now because they're not written out yet, but he says, you know, after the vote, everything will be drawn down and we'll have the meeting to let you know what you're going to get.[47]
> I told him it didn't sound too good to me the way he was putting it across to me because of the idea that, you know, he was going to give me a promise, what they were going to give me after the election . . . . I told Ralph that the way it sounded, he was getting paid off, and he said yeah, he was. I also said something about making the money for the mortgage because I knew he had just been turned down for a mortgage.[48]
> He goes, "well, if you tell anyone what I've told you, I'll get you, I'll kill you. I'd kill you if you tell anyone of what I've told you" . . . I go, "you didn't mean that." And he said, "I'll get you. I'll kill you." And he just walked away, split.[49]

Yankee added, "I don't think he was serious. I can't recollect that he was, but when anyone throws a threat, I assume that you know, I've got to tell someone about it or, you know, report—"[50] According to Yankee, while his helper Vincent Negron was present near the machine when this occurred, and could not hear what was said between him and Picazzo at the time, Negron did overhear him subsequently tell Patterson what Picazzo had stated.

Yankee testified that he decided to tell his leadman, Pat Patterson, about Picazzo's threat to kill him and what Picazzo had told him about the benefits and, after doing so, asked Patterson not to tell anyone else about this incident, "I asked Pat to be quiet about it and Pat says, '"Yeah, I will."' Yankee related that he had asked Patterson not to repeat what he had told him because, "I know Ralph: He used to be my leadman. I don't know if he would do anything, but people can get greedy sometimes . . . . Yeah, I didn't want to get no one hurt at [46] Yankee related, "I just heard, you know—from what I understood, the way everybody was acting . . . a lot of people were voting, yes, because they wanted a union. That's the way I took it . . . . I work night shift and night shift is small and when I was coming in they were leaving. So I didn't really get to sit down and . . . I was left out of everything more or less."

[47] Yankee testified that Picazzo did mention that if the Union won the election, the employees would only be assigned duties consistent with their particular jobs, and receive certain benefits "medical and all that . . . he didn't go into heavy detail but he says it'll be benefits better than what we have now at this time, but we got to pay for it, per month." Yankee also remembered that he had asked Picazzo if there was going to be a union meeting before the election was held and Picazzo said, "No."

[48] Yankee testified that Picazzo had said, "Yeah . . . in a funny way, like, I don't know for sure, you know, what way he meant," whether Picazzo was acknowledging being "paid off" as a fact or was questioning Yankee's seriousness in asking such a question at all. Yankee stated, "I didn't know if he was serious about it, but I wasn't really concerned. The only thing I was really concerned about was the threat."

[49] Yankee also testified on cross-examination that Picazzo "was going on telling about the benefits and stuff and he goes, Oh, and if you tell anyone what I said, I'll kill you! And when he started saying that stuff, that's when I came back and started bringing up stuff, are you getting paid off for this? You're making promises, you say you're going to make a promise after I write down my vote? You know, what is this?" He related that Picazzo came back later that day and asked him for 25 cents, "And he acted like nothing happened."

[50] Yankee also testified that while he did not think that Picazzo's threat was seriously made, "I didn't want to think that," but Picazzo had "acted like he was serious, somewhat."

all."[51] Yankee added that later that evening, Patterson approached him and said, "I had to tell Don [Moore]."

Yankee testified that the next day Moore came to his home and advised him that Patterson had told him about the incident between him and Picazzo, and Moore was "disturbed by what had happened" and Moore asked him to explain what had occurred. Yankee stated that after he had done so, Moore asked him if "he would be willing to sign a statement if it was all true, sign a statement to back it up." Yankee related that he agreed to do so and told Moore additionally that, "I didn't expect Pat to tell anyone. I wanted to keep quiet because I didn't want to have anyone get in trouble. I just wanted to keep my job. I told [Moore] the only reason I brought it up to Pat is because when the threat came up to me, I just felt that I needed to tell someone." Yankee recounted that he then "wrote it and signed it at the house." Yankee continued that the conversation he had had with Picazzo influenced his vote at the election because, although "[I] was telling everyone I was going to vote no . . . I was wondering, 'It might be better. Who knows?'" but after this conversation with Picazzo, "I knew 100 percent that I wasn't going to do it." Yankee added that because he was not being invited to union meetings, he felt that he was not liked, and that was another reason for his voting against the Union.[52]

Concerning this Larry Colvard testified that 2 or 3 days before the election Brent Yankee had told him that Picazzo threatened him saying, "I'm going to kill you." Colvard stated that he went directly to his brother Jerry Colvard and told him, "Well, another one's been threatened." Colvard added that, "Because already up to that time, if I'm not mistaken, Brent's car window had been smashed out, stuff like this. There was little things written on the bathroom walls about us. All over. It was just the atmosphere of the company."[53] Freeland also testified about this incident. Freeland stated that sometime during the week before the election Brent Yankee had told him,

> . . . that Ralph had threatened him about saying things to his supervisors, because word had gotten out about the things that were being said, and Brent was rather shaken up at the time. It was hard to really get a clear story out of him. He said—he said something about threatening violence, and there was another person there who thought the same thing, because it was one of those situations where it is hard to believe what you are hearing. That is what he referred to me.[54]

Freeland related that Yankee had told him that the reason Picazzo "had talked to him" was because "somebody had said something to one of the supervisors" about Picazzo speaking to employees about the Union.

Picazzo recalled that he had had a conversation with Brent Yankee 2 days prior to the election with regard to union benefits, "Something of that nature, yes."[55] Picazzo testified:

> I approached Brent Yankee. We were pretty chummy. I asked him what was going on, how he had been, and he said fine. Hadn't seen him in a long time, because he works on the second shift, and he then proceeded to take over the conversation, discussing the problems he had had with his former girlfriend, or a future girlfriend,[56] and somewhere along the line, he asked me how I had felt about the way the situation was going with the union, and I had told him, well apparently everything looks all right. He then asked about benefits . . . could you tell me more or less what we tend to gain?
> Well, I then explained to him . . . as far as I know, I couldn't really say, because I did not know about any possible benefits. All I told him was that if the election went either way, if it went for, that there would be negotiations, but I made no promises whatsoever, and also he did, kidding around, ask me if I was being paid by the union, and I told him—my response was, are you kidding?
> Anyway, he then asked me . . . are there going to be any more meetings, and I says, as far as I know, I don't think so. He says, well, there must be at least one more meeting, you know, right before the election. I says, as far as I know, I don't know of any.
> And then in my closing statement, I told him, be careful who you talk to.

Picazzo stated that he had made this latter remark because there were rumors circulating among the employees that "heads will roll," certain people would be losing their jobs, with a "general belief that apparently Don Moore was going to get even." Picazzo added,

> Okay, there were certain rumors as to an employee by the name of Jerry Colvard that they believed that his stand opposing the union coming into the plant, and that also that they felt also that Don Moore was only using him until the election was over, in which case there was a possible chance he may be terminated . . . . there was rumors to a certain list of certain names of certain employees which were pending termination . . . [by] Mr. Moore.

[51] Yankee also testified that he asked Patterson "to keep it quiet because I didn't want to get in a hassle over it; you know, a fight or anything you know, with the other guys, and get my car broken, my windows broken, like I did have happen after I did—after Pat mentioned it I ended up getting my windows broken and stuff."

[52] Yankee testified that Pat Patterson, his leadman, while they were at a bar together after work, recommended that he vote against the Union.

[53] Colvard testified that written on the bathroom walls was the phrase, "Death to the Dog Brothers," an obvious reference to the Colvard brothers.

[54] Freeland remembered that the other employee present was named Vince.

[55] Picazzo testified that Vincent Negron, Yankee's helper, was also present and that this conversation occurred at Yankee's machine.

[56] Yankee was unsure if during the conversation with Picazzo he had discussed problems with his girlfriend.

While Picazzo admitted that he may have passed along some of these rumors, he denied having started them.[57]

Picazzo denied that he had ever threatened to kill Yankee, either seriously or jokingly, if Yankee told anyone about what Picazzo had said to him. Picazzo also testified that neither Moore, the Colvard brothers, Freeland, nor Brent Yankee himself had ever accused Picazzo to his face of threatening to kill Yankee.

Larry Colvard, employed by the Respondent as a forklift driver until May 26, 1982,[58] testified that Picazzo had, on occasion, discussed the Union with him and that "as the election drew near [these discussions] would get more and more frequent. The last week was every day, maybe once, twice." He stated that Picazzo would say, "Good things about what the union's going to do for him but what Chicago Metallic hasn't. That's the best way to sum it up."[59] Colvard added that he felt threatened by Picazzo,

> Only for the fact that when he was talking to me and if somebody more high powered than he would come up, he would automatically clam up. There would be no more. And then it became to where he said . . . what would happen to my older brother, which is a supervisor there. He told me directly that when the union was in, Jerry was gone . . . which is my brother—and I figured that if he's got enough power to get my brother out of there, he got enough power to get me out of there. I'd only been there two months.[60]

Colvard continued that about "one or two, three maybe" days after the election, while having a "blinking red light" repaired on his forklift by the electrician, Picazzo came over and asked what they were doing and then said,

> Yeah, it's going to be fun around here now. I'm going to enjoy this a lot. Heads are going to roll. The guys who talk for the company are going to get their heads busted.

Colvard related that Charles Young, the electrician, was present when Picazzo had made this statement and that soon thereafter he told his brother Jerry Colvard, the warehouse supervisor, about what Picazzo had said.

Picazzo testified that, after the election, he had a conversation with Larry Colvard, at which Chuck Young was present and to the best of his recollection, although he really did not recall what was said,

> It was mainly along the same frame. These employees were asking me about certain allegations, or certain people that were passing on these rumors, and they were asking how I felt about them, and I told them . . . as to my knowledge that I did not know . . . as to how valid these rumors were.[61]

Picazzo denied that he had told Colvard that after the election his brother, Jerry Colvard, would be gone, or that if the Union won the election, Jerry Colvard would be fired. However, he did admit telling Larry Colvard and/or other employees "of a rumor" concerning Jerry Colvard, as he previously testified.

Mark Freeland testified that he and Picazzo had spoken together about the Union on a daily basis for 2 or 3 weeks before the election.[62] He stated that Picazzo talked about the benefits to employees if the Union won the election such as, pay raises, medical and dental coverage, and about the "downfalls" of union representation, as such initiation fees and dues. Freeeland related that Picazzo had mentioned his brother Jerry Colvard in a conversation,

> He said that if the union [was] to go through, that there was a possibility that rather than making Jerry a management position, considering he was the traffic manager, that they would fire him, because they wouldn't want to pay him the wages that he would deserve, you know, holding the title, so that he would probably be fired after the union came in.

Freeland added that Picazzo also told him,

> That it would be wiser to go ahead and go with the flow of the union, as not to buck it, because after—he was very sure that it would go through, and that after it did, if you was a no vote, that you would be making waves, and everything, and it would be rough for you.

[57] Picazzo testified that "somewhere between September and October 1981," prior to the filing of the Union's petition he had seen a typed list of employees' names in Ron Williams' office, showing "any days they were absent and tardy, any discrepancies of that nature." Picazzo stated that there was a yellow line drawn through some of these names and that Williams told him that there were "marginal employees," who "were to be watched." Picazzo added that Kreuger was also present when this occurred.

[58] Colvard testified as a witness for the Respondent. At the time of the hearing Colvard was not working, having "been hurt on the job."

[59] While Colvard initially testified that he had never told Picazzo that he was for or against the Union, after being shown his sworn affidavit given to a Board agent on December 1, 1981, in which he stated, "Whenever Ralph talked to me, I told him I was opposed to the Union," Colvard now testified, "I probably told everybody I was opposed to it at one time."

[60] While Colvard stated in his affidavit that "[Picazzo] did not directly threaten me with any reprisals if I did not support the union and I did not hear him threaten any other employees," Colvard maintained he felt threatened by Picazzo "even if he never said a word . . . he did enough that I thought about it . . . . I was worried about my job . . . my job security was threatened." Colvard also stated in his affidavit that prior to the election, Picazzo had told him, "If the Union wins [Jerry Colvard] will be gone." He added that Picazzo "made it sound like the company would, because they figure—he figured that since Jerry was still a wage-earner and not a salary man that they wouldn't put him on salary, and the Union wouldn't want him to be—wouldn't let a company man stay in their union, or something, for some way of that, so that that is why he would get canned."

[61] Larry Colvard denied that prior to the election there had been any rumor around the plant that a number of employees were going to be fired. He also denied asking Picazzo if his brother Jerry's name was on a list of employees to be so discharged.

[62] Freeland testified that it was common knowledge among the employees that Jerry Colvard, Larry Colvard, and he were all against the Union. He added that during their conversations together, sometimes including Larry Colvard as well, Picazzo would tell him not to relate any of this to Moore, Williams, or Jerry Colvard, but Picazzo did not threaten reprisals if they did so.

Freeland testified that the day after the election he approached Picazzo and since the union had won the election, asked Picazzo, in effect, what he could do to get on the Union's good side, and Picazzo responded,

> He said I was a fuck-up, and that I better watch my ass, because I was on the wrong side of the fence, and things could get rough, you know, as far as my job went, because I was a no vote, and I just was not for the union at all.

Freeland recounted that he repeated what Picazzo had said to him in this conversation, to his "boss, who is Jerry, my brother."

Picazzo testified that before the election, he had a conversation with Mark Freeland concerning Jerry Colvard wherein Freeland "wanted to know if there was anything valid to the rumors that were being passed around as to the standing of his brother Jerry Colvard's working position." Picazzo stated, "I told him as far as I know, it is just a rumor, that I did not know if it was true or not." Picazzo could recall nothing else that was said during this conversation. Again, Picazzo denied that he had told Freeland that, after the election, Jerry Colvard would be gone. Picazzo continued that a day after the election he had another conversation with Freeland as follows,

> Well, he seemed mighty disappointed as to the turn of the way the election had gone, and he just wanted to know what was to be expected, and I told him as I told everyone else that now we just have to wait and see, you know, what happens afterwards. It is totally up . . . to the negotiations.

Picazzo added that he had never told Freeland that he was a "fuck-up," nor ever threatened Freeland with the loss of his job if he did not support the Union.

The Charging Party called two rebuttal witnesses, Reuben Vasquez and Dale Scott. Vasquez, employed by the Respondent as a machine operator, testified that he was on "medical leave" the 3 or 4 weeks before the election, and that during this period a number of union meetings were held at his home. He stated that at these meetings no employee complained that Picazzo was threatening or intimidating them concerning their support for or against the Union.[63]

Scott, employed by the Respondent as a welder, testified that in the weeks prior to the election on November 5, 1981, there were rumors circulating around the plant concerning Jerry Colvard and that, "There was a few people taking bets on how long he was going to last after [the election] was over with, was about it." Scott stated that no employees during this period complained to him that Picazzo was threatening or intimidating them, nor had he heard any rumors to this effect, "Not around me." However, Scott related that he had heard that "somebody went up the front office, said there was threats going on, and it spread all over the shop," but he did not hear Picazzo's name "tied in with the threats." Scott added that he had also heard that the employees threatened were Brent Yankee, Larry Colvard, and Mark Freeland, but again, not as to the name of the person making such threats.

The evidence also shows that the Respondent has a no-solicitation rule in its employees' handbook. This rule provides:

> Past experience has shown that solicitations and collections always get out of hand. For this reason, collections, soliciting of any kind, the selling of tickets or merchandise, or the circulations of petitions on company property are forbidden during working hours. Additionally, there will be no distribution of literature in working areas during either working or nonworking hours. Further, there will be no oral solicitation during working hours in any plant area.

However, the rule itself is not posted in the plant.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The supervisory status of Ralph Picazzo

Section 2(11) of the Act provides:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibility to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

Supervisors are excluded from coverage of the Act.[64] In enacting Section 2(11), Congress emphasized its intention that only truly supervisory personnel vested with "genuine management prerogatives" should be considered supervisors, and not "straw bosses, leadmen, set-up men and other minor supervisory employees."[65]

The status of a supervisor under the Act is determined by an individual's duties, not by his title or job classification.[66] It is well settled that an employee cannot be [63] However, Picazzo was complaining on behalf of the Union. Presumably, the employees who attended the union meetings would either be for the Union, leaning towards supporting the Union, or undecided as to union representation, but presumably definitely not for the Employer and against the Union. Therefore the chances of their either being intimidated by Picazzo if he were engaging in such conduct, or complaining about it to the Union at these meetings, would be slight at best.

[64] Sec. 2(3) of the Act provides:

> The term "employee" shall include any employee . . . but shall not include . . . any individual employed as . . . a supervisor . . . .

Sec. 14(a) of the Act provides:

> Nothing herein shall prohibit any individual employed as a supervisor from becoming or remaining a member of a labor organization, but no employer subject to the Act shall be compelled to deem individuals defined herein as supervisors as employees for the purpose of any law, either national or local relating to collective bargaining.

transformed into a supervisor merely by the vesting of a title and theoretical power to perform one or more of the enumerated functions in Section 2(11) of the Act.[67] To qualify as a supervisor, it is not necessary that an individual possess all of these powers. Rather, possession of any one of them is sufficient to confer supervisory status.[68] However, consistent with the statutory language and legislative intent, it is well recognized that Section 2(11)'s disjunctive listing of supervisory indicia does not alter the essential conjunctive requirement that a supervisor must exercise independent judgment in performing the enumerated functions.[69] Indeed, as the court stated in Beverly Enterprises v. NLRB, 661 F.2d 1095, 1098 (6th Cir. 1981):

> . . . regardless of the specific kind of supervisory authority at issue, its exercise must involve the use of true independent judgment in the employer's interest before such exercise of authority becomes that of a supervisor.

Thus, the exercise of some supervisory authority in a merely routine, clerical, perfunctory, or sporadic manner does not elevate an employee into the supervisory ranks, "the test must be the significance of his judgment and directions."[70] Consequently, an employee does not become a supervisor merely because he gives some instructions or minor orders to other employees.[71] Nor does an employee become a supervisor because he has greater skills and job responsibilities or more duties than fellow employees.[72] Additionally, the existence of independent judgment alone will not suffice for, "the decisive question is whether [the employee has] been found to possess authority to use independent judgment with respect to the exercise . . . of some one or more of the specific authorities listed in Section 2(11) of the Act."[73] In short, "some kinship to management, some empathetic relationship between employer and employee must exist before the latter becomes a supervisor for the former."[74] Moreover, in connection with the authority to recommend actions, Section 2(11) of the Act requires that the recommendations must be effective.

The burden of proving that an employee is a "supervisor" within the meaning of the Act rests on the party alleging that such status exists.[75] In making determinations regarding supervisory status, "the Board has a duty to employees to be alert not to construe supervisory status too broadly because the employee who is deemed a supervisor is denied employee rights which the Act is intended to protect."[76]

The Respondent asserts that Picazzo is a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and is thereby outside the Act's purview and protection. The General Counsel maintains that Ralph Picazzo is not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, adding,

> Section 7 of the Act provides that "employees" have certain protected rights and an employer commits unfair labor practices under Section 8(a) of the Act where it infringes upon those "employee" rights. Although the Board had held that certain employer conduct with respect to "supervisors" constitutes a violation of Section 8(a) of the Act, Parker Robb Chevrolet, Inc., 262 NLRB 402, Counsel for the General concedes that Respondent has not engaged in such conduct with respect to Picazzo. Thus, Picazzo is only entitled to the protection of the Act if he is not a "supervisor" within the meaning of the Act.

At the time of his discharge, Picazzo held the position of assistant leadman and therefore the initial issue to be resolved herein is whether, in the performance of his duties, Picazzo was a statutory supervisor when terminated.

At the outset it should be noted that, with regard to the issue of Picazzo's supervisory status, I credit the testimony of Picazzo over that of Moore. While it is true that Picazzo's testimony did reflect instances of uncertainty and evasiveness and was somewhat guarded at times, Moore's testimony on occasion also exhibited these same characteristics and, importantly, Picazzo's testimony on this issue was supported somewhat by Steve Kosiek and Mark Freeland, who testified as witnesses for the General Counsel and the Respondent, respectively, and whose testimony I believe.[77] Moreover, and significantly as to this issue, Ron Williams and George Kreuger, the witnesses best able to testify as to Picazzo's actual duties and authority as assistant leadman in general, and the effectiveness of his recommendations in particular, were not called as witnesses to testify. From the failure of the Respondent to offer Williams' and Kreuger's testimony regarding Picazzo's duties and authority, I draw the inference that their testimony would have been adverse or unfavorable to the Respondent's case and its contentions herein.[78]

See Shop-Rite Supermarket, 231 NLRB 500 (1977). Freeland, on the other hand, was no longer employed by the Respondent when he testified herein, having left the Respondent's employ over an argument with his stepbrothers, employees Jerry and Larry Colvard. Testifying as a witness for the Respondent, his testimony on the issue of Picazzo's duties, in part supportive of Picazzo's testimony, is more likely to be true.

The Respondent in its brief asserts,

> . . . it is clear that the assistant lead is a supervisor. As conceived, the job requires decision-making in various areas of supervisory concern, including work assignments, discipline, scheduling and employee evaluations. In addition, the assistant lead is relied upon by management to oversee quality control and safety. And while Picazzo may not have consistently performed each of these duties, the mere fact that he had authority to do so is sufficient to establish his supervisory status. Hirsch Broadcasting Co., 116 NLRB 1780, 1783 (1956).

I do not agree. And while the Respondent further asserts that "From Picazzo's own testimony, it is clear that his job description [R. Exh. 25] serves as a practical summary of his job," as will be discussed hereinafter, this does not reflect nor consider various important and significant differences between the job description and the actual duties performed by Picazzo.[79]

Moreover, despite the written job description, the evidence herein indicates that there was some confusion concerning just what Picazzo's duties actually were to be, as illustrated by Moore's own testimony that, after initially meeting with Picazzo to explain the duties of the position of assistant leadman, Picazzo had subsequently come to him for "clarification" of such duties; and further, that Moore had been required thereafter to hold a meeting with Williams, Kreuger, and Picazzo, "to redefine the direction so that there wasn't such a drastic overlap" in the duties of Kreuger and Picazzo as leadman and assistant leadman, respectively. Picazzo testified that he had never seen a copy of the job description in evidence although he and Moore had discussed a "rough draft" of his duties soon after he became the assistant leadman, and he and Moore "went over roughly just more or less what [Moore] wanted me to do as assistant leadman under George Kreuger, which was mainly to assist with George," maintain the operation of the machinery, and act as leadman in the maintenance department.[80]

In the instant case, while the evidence shows that Picazzo had authority to assign and direct production employees and to evaluate them, including newly hired employees whom he also trained in the performance of their jobs, had a role in the disciplinary process, and performed certain other duties which might be construed as supervisory in nature, on the record as a whole I am convinced that Picazzo possessed no authority to act other than in a routine manner and only as a conduit between employees and management, and that he was therefore not a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Further, a preponderance of the evidence fails to show that Picazzo exercised any independent judgment in performing his duties as assistant leadman.

The record is clear that Picazzo had no authority to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, or reward any employee, or to adjust employee grievances. While Picazzo's rate of pay as assistant leadman was higher than the other production employees, except for those employees with substantially greater seniority than himself, still he was paid on an hourly basis like the other employees, received the same fringe benefits as they did, "punched a time clock" as other employees did, ate lunch with the employees in the lunch area, and had no office, desk, or telephone assigned for his own exclusive use as did acknowledged Supervisors Moore and Williams.[81] Moreover, George Kreuger, the leadman, distributed employee paychecks and prepared the weekly production work assignment schedules, and Ron Williams, the plant superintendent, kept and maintained employee timecards and absentee records.

The Respondent in its brief also asserts,

> According to the job description . . . the assistant lead's primary function is "To supervise the production operations of the assigned department in the most effective and efficient manner." [Emphasis added.] In accordance with this goal, the assistant lead has the responsibility of recommending "changes in work methods or procedure and cost reduction possibilities" and can "plan and control department operations."

However, there is no evidence in the record that Picazzo ever recommended changes in work methods or procedures and/or cost reduction possibilities, or that he in any way had any input into the planning and controlling of the production department's operations. Additionally, there is no evidence in the record that the Respondent looked to or sought such input from Picazzo about these matters.

In this vein, Picazzo testified that while he regularly attended management meetings during which plant production and expansion problems were discussed, he was [78] From the failure of a party to produce material witnesses or relevant evidence obviously within its control without satisfactory explanation, the trier of the facts may draw an inference that such testimony or evidence would be unfavorable to that party. See 7-Eleven Food Store, 257 NLRB 108 (1981); Publishers Printing Co., 233 NLRB 1070 (1977).

[79] The Respondent's description of Picazzo's actual duties is as follows:

> Picazzo worked the day-shift with responsibilities in the production and maintenance areas. He testified that his immediate supervisor was plant superintendent Ron Williams, and that his duties were to assist the production lead, George Kreuger, and "to head the maintenance department." On any given day, Picazzo had 18 machine operators and helpers under him in the production department as well as three maintenance employees (an electrician, a hydraulic pump repairman, and a welder) and the janitors. He did not work side-by-side on a daily basis with any of the production or maintenance employees. Rather he gave them assistance, when necessary, which was on the average of once or twice a week. In the production department, Picazzo supervised the maintenance of equipment, checked the metal inventory and made weekly evaluations of employee performance. He also assigned work to production employees based on a schedule kept at the quality control desk. Significantly, the employees would go to Picazzo whenever they had questions regarding their work assignments, and he would organize overtime crews to meet production needs.

[80] The fact that additional meetings were required to clarify the duties of assistant leadman would tend to support Picazzo's testimony.

[81] Judd Valve Co., 248 NLRB 112 (1980).

never asked for his opinion or recommendations concerning such problems nor asked to provide input into these discussions. He stated that he "sat and listened . . . all they do is say what to do, and I do it."[82] The Respondent alleges in its brief:

> Picazzo would have the Administrative Law Judge believe that a leadman—who worked directly in the quality control area, checked specifications daily, insured the quality of the product and issued warnings to those who failed to meet the standards—had absolutely nothing to report on the success or failure of production methods and that he was never asked for his opinion. Why would the Company even bother to include Picazzo if nothing was expected of him in the first place?

However, Picazzo's testimony concerning this is not at all unbelievable as the Respondent would imply. The evidence suggests, and it is reasonable to assume, that Moore and Williams, in conjunction with the Respondent's main office, set production policy and planned and controlled overall departmental operations. Since Picazzo's duties were to assist Kreuger in implementing these policies on the production level under the overall supervision of Moore and the immediate direction of Williams, Picazzo would have to be aware of management decisions, thus his attendance at these meetings, where problems arising therefrom were discussed, would be necessary and helpful. Also, Picazzo's role as an informational conduit between the employees and management, implicit in his duties as assistant leadman, would require his presence at these meetings.[83] Moreover, Picazzo reported to Williams daily, and it is again reasonable to assume that he would inform Williams of any problems arising in the production area, so that Williams thus had the information at hand during these meetings negating the need to question Picazzo thereon. On the other hand, while Picazzo may not have been asked for his opinions during these meetings, there is no evidence that he was specifically precluded from participation in the decisions, it appearing that he just did not do so. Significantly, while Moore testified herein, he did not specifically dispute Picazzo's above testimony, and as pointed out above, neither Williams nor Kreuger was called as a witness by the Respondent to contradict Picazzo's testimony. From the record evidence, it strongly appears that the responsibility and authority in this area was actually vested in Ron Williams, the plant superintendent, in Donald Moore, the plant manager, and perhaps somewhat in George Kreuger, the production leadman, and not with Picazzo.

The Respondent's brief continues,

> The assistant lead also has responsibilities in the area of work schedules. He can assign work and adjust schedules, arrange changes in job assignments, assist in the preparation of the vacation schedule, and plan temporary personnel requirements when required by the production schedule . . . . [Picazzo] also assigned work to production employees based on a schedule kept at the quality control desk. Significantly, the employees would go to Picazzo whenever they had questions regarding their work assignments, and he would tell them what was required. In addition, he would organize overtime crews to meet production needs.

However, the evidence herein shows that Kreuger, the production leadman, prepared the weekly work schedule which indicates "the type of bars and which machine is going to run it, and also who was going to operate the machine." Picazzo played no part in the preparation of these work assignments. While Picazzo distributed the actual work assignments to the employees each day, the assignments were based on the work schedules prepared by Kreuger and there is no evidence in the record that Picazzo had any choice as to which employees were assigned to which machine. It would also appear from the evidence that Picazzo had no authority to vary the information on the work schedule in any way, and although he had transferred employees from one work assignment to another, this was done only on the instructions of Williams to do so.[84]

All things considered, Picazzo's role in assigning employees to the roll forming machines is a routine one, "more clerical than supervisory"[85] and does not require the use of independent judgment and accordingly does not confer supervisory status. In fact, the assigning of employees to operate the machines requires little or no skill or judgment since Picazzo simply followed the production leadman's listing. Put in proper perspective, Picazzo exercised very limited or no judgment at all in al-

[82] I assume that the Respondent submits that Picazzo's attendance at management meetings also indicates his supervisory status. As the administrative law judge in Ahrens Aircraft, 259 NLRB 839, 843 (1981), states,

> Although under certain circumstances such attendance has identified an employee as a company representative, I am aware of no case in which such attendance, in the absence of other criteria, is sufficient to cloak an individual with supervisory status. It should also be noted that attendance at management meetings is not among the supervisory functions identified in Section 2(11).

[83] Picazzo's role in transmitting instructions from management and any information from employees back to management, standing alone, does not make him a supervisor for purposes of the Act. See Injected Rubber Products Corp., 258 NLRB 687 (1981); American Feather Products Corp., 248 NLRB 1102 (1980).

[84] I am not unmindful that Picazzo stated in his Board affidavit that each morning he, Williams, and Kreuger would "get together and decide what work had to be done and who was going to operate which machine." However, this is not necessarily inconsistent with his testimony at the hearing that he assigned employees to the roll forming machines on the basis of the work schedules prepared by Kreuger, only reassigning them when instructed to do so by Williams. There is no evidence in the record that any input by Picazzo at these morning meetings regarding the assignments was other than routine or perfunctory, or required the exercise of independent judgment. The more likely circumstances occurring at these meetings were that Williams decided what work had to be done and he and Kreuger considered any changes in work assignments. Picazzo was then informed as to what work assignments he was to distribute to the employees, with Picazzo's role being that of a conduit of managerial decision based on the work schedule and production needs, rather than with Picazzo exercising any independent judgment on decision-making as to the scheduling of the production employees. See Rich's Precision Foundry, 262 NLRB 678 (1982); Hydro Conduit Corp., 254 NLRB 433 (1981). Since Williams and Kreuger were not called as witnesses by the Respondent, this omission lends support to the above.

[85] Hydro Conduit Corp., supra; NLRB v. St. Francis Hospital, 601 F.2d 404 (9th Cir. 1979). Contrast: Liquid Transporters, 250 NLRB 1421 (1980).

locating the assigned jobs to employees and, as assistant leadman, merely served as a conduit for management instructions. Thus, "The assignment of work was routine in nature and did not depend on the exercise of independent discretion, which is the hallmark of the supervisor."[86]

Moreover, there is no showing that employees require close supervision in performing the duties to which Picazzo assigned them. Since the products to be produced are generally standardized and the employees assigned to work classifications, the record fails to establish that any directions given the employees by Picazzo required the exercise of independent judgment.[87] Additionally, the fact that the employees went to Picazzo "whenever they had questions regarding their work assignments" does nothing to change this. Picazzo was the person who distributed their work assignments, thus having full knowledge of the work schedules, and was charged with maintenance responsibilities as to the proper functioning of the machines. Being also admittedly an experienced employee, with "above-average technical and mechanical ability," the employees would naturally bring their questions to him and their doing so does not confer supervisory status on Picazzo. This appears to be merely a case of employees seeking advice or instruction from a more experienced and knowledgeable employee who is assigned additional duties, than that of employees seeking managerial or supervisory direction that would elevate such action to that commensurate with supervisory authority. There is no evidence that he exercises in this activity any of the powers listed in Section 2(11) of the Act.

Implicit in the Respondent's assertion that Picazzo is a supervisor is Picazzo's responsibility for seeing that the work is completed properly and on schedule. However, this responsibility is not, in and of itself, sufficient to confer supervisory status.[88] There is no indication in the record that Picazzo's resolution of any problem concerning this responsibility requires the exercise of independent judgment characteristic of statutory supervisory status.[89] That is, there is no indication that his actions in resolving such routine problems represent more than an exercise of work judgment rather than that of delegated authority.[90] It would appear that if Picazzo encounters any problems which he cannot resolve in a routine manner, he is obliged to report this to Williams who would resolve it. Even if Picazzo had the authority to correct the work of employees, there is no evidence that he could reprimand or othewise discipline them "to an extent which might significantly affect the employees' job status or work to his detriment." Thus, Picazzo exercised little meaningful control over his coworkers' performance.[91]

While it is Picazzo who requests employees to work overtime whenever there is a need to do so, it is Williams who makes the determination as to whether overtime is to be performed and which employees are not to receive such overtime work. Furthermore, Picazzo does not direct employees to accept overtime work. He merely asks those employees who desire the additional work to speak up and accepts their decisions as to the assignments. There is no basis in the record for concluding that Picazzo exercises independent judgment in selecting or in effectively recommending the selection of employees who are to be assigned to perform such overtime work. Additionally, Picazzo lacks the authority to grant employees time off. He has no discretion to grant or reject employee requests to leave work early and there is no evidence that he has ever done so. Accordingly, his authority in this regard, if any, is not supervisory.

Picazzo spends a good deal of his time inspecting the work being performed by the other employees to ensure that it is being done properly and to specification. Yet, the work of an inspector, ensuring the quality of the product being produced, is not one of the powers listed in Section 2(11) of the Act. In fact, Congress made a conscious decision to exclude such work from the definition of a statutory supervisor.[92] Of course, if, in the performance of his inspections, Picazzo had exercised any of the supervisory powers of Section 2(11) of the Act—such as being able to discharge, direct, reward, or discipline employees, or effectively recommend such action—then there would be a basis for concluding that he is a supervisor. However, Picazzo does not exercise any of these statutory powers. So far as the record discloses, any direction that he may give in connection with inspection of work being performed by the employees "is dictated solely and routinely by the specific demand of each production job."[93] It has not been shown to be other than ministerial.[94] Moreover, there is no evidence in the record that Picazzo "arranges changes in job assignments" independently, using any discretionary authority, nor "assists in the preparation of the vacation schedule."

The Respondent also maintains in its brief,

> Regarding personnel, the assistant lead is required to write employee evaluations . . . . More significantly, the assistant lead "recommends wage increases or promotions," as well as the "hiring of additional employees." [Emphasis added.]

While it is true that Picazzo does write evaluations of employees, he testified uncontradictedly that he makes no recommendations therein as to promotion, transfer, or salary raises. The evidence shows that Williams makes all the recommendations as to these actions, with Moore having the final say thereon. The evidence strongly infers that Picazzo's evaluations of employees are but the first step in an evaluation process for salary raises with Williams and/or Moore making an independent determination as to whether employees should receive raises and, perhaps where necessary, as to determinations of promotion or transfer. There is no evidence herein that Picazzo's evaluations are followed and used as the basis for such determinations. Nor does the evidence show that Picazzo can effectively recommend any of the above actions. At best, the evidence shows that Picazzo had some input about these matters, but his evaluations are only one aspect of the information considered, with the final decisions in these areas being made independently by Williams and/or Moore.[95] What weight, if any, would be given Picazzo's evaluations was obviously completely within Williams' discretion, and since the evaluation could be rejected by the Respondent without explanation, these evaluations cannot be regarded as having any decisive effect upon the employees involved. So far as the record discloses, any information which Picazzo may provide in connection with these matters is based on his working skill and experience, and is insufficient to confer supervisory status. Moreover, there is no evidence in the record showing that Picazzo recommends the hiring of additional employees.

The Respondent additionally asserts,

> As to discipline, the assistant lead not only assures that Company work rules are enforced, but he also "initiates and recommends appropriate disciplinary action when necessary."

However, while the evidence tends to show that Picazzo can verbally admonish employees for lateness, absenteeism, violating safety rules, and perhaps for performing incorrect or unsafe work, his responsibility for ensuring that work is performed safely "does not reflect the kind of discretion indicative of supervisory status."[96] More importantly, absent some showing of impact on employees' job status, verbal reprimands do not constitute "discipline" within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.[97] Here, there is no evidence that Picazzo's admonishments regarding unsafe or improper performance of work have ever had any effect on employees' job status. Therefore, such verbal warnings do not serve to establish the existence of authority to discipline employees.

The evidence also shows that Picazzo issued written warning notices and placed employees on suspension. He testified that he took such action only upon instructions to do so, generally by Williams but also by Moore or Kreuger. According to Picazzo, after being told to discipline an employee for a particular incident and with the specific discipline to be imposed, Picazzo prepared an "Employee Warning" form, signed it, submitted the form to Williams for approval and Williams' signature, then delivered the form to the employee involved. After explaining its contents to the employee Picazzo would request the employee to sign the form. If the employee disputed the warning notice Picazzo told the employee that he could do nothing to change it and that the employee would have to discuss the warning with either Williams or Moore for any further consideration. Picazzo testified that, on occasion, Williams would tell him that he would sign the warning notice at a later date and that, in these situations, Picazzo would issue the warning notice to the employee without Williams' signature thereon. It should be noted that the testimony of Steve Kosiek tended to support Picazzo's assertions concerning the scope of his authority to discipline employees in this connection but, more importantly, Freeland, a witness for the Respondent, totally supported Picazzo's testimony as to this. Freeland testified that if he questioned or disputed a written warning issued to him by Picazzo, he went to Williams or Kreuger, or someone else "above" Picazzo for any further action thereon. Freeland also testified that he knew that Picazzo "more than likely" cleared the language on the warning with Williams before showing the warning to the employees, and that Picazzo did not have the authority to change any wording on the warning notices without Williams' approval. I therefore believe Picazzo's rendition of the scope of his authority in this regard. Again, significantly, neither Williams nor Kreuger testified at the hearing to dispute any of this, enforcing my above findings.

On the basis of the foregoing, with respect to the discipline of employees, Picazzo merely acted as a conduit for managerial decision, to convey the previously determined discipline to the employees. Picazzo's preparation of the warning form, obtaining signatures on the form, showing the form to the employee and distributing copies of the form for filing, are merely ministerial tasks which do not require nor thereby constitute the exercise of independent judgment.[98] The fact that the employees may perceive Picazzo as a supervisor when they receive the warnings from him, and see his signature on the line labeled "Signature of Supervisor," is not determinative because the facts herein show that Picazzo is not exercising supervisory authority.[99]

The Respondent also argues that Picazzo is a supervisor under the Act because he effectively recommends the discharge of employees, citing an incident in which a former production employee, Tom O'Shaughnessey, was discharged allegedly because of Picazzo. However, the evidence does not support this allegation. Briefly, since the facts thereon have been set forth in full detail above, Picazzo testified that Kreuger had informed him that Moore wanted O'Shaughnessey "out" that day. When Picazzo reported that O'Shaughnessey had just left his machine unattended, Kreuger directed Picazzo "to get" O'Shaughnessey for this and to terminate him. Picazzo issued a warning notice to O'Shaughnessey who tore it up in Picazzo's presence and demanded to speak to Moore about this. Picazzo denied making any recommendation with respect to O'Shaughnessey's termination.

Moore, on the other hand, testified that Picazzo and Kreuger had come to his office and reported, "It's Mr. O'Shaughnessey again." Moore asked them what the problem was and Picazzo responded that O'Shaughnessey had left his machine unattended. Moore stated that since O'Shaughnessey was close to being fired anyway because of his unsatisfactory employment record, he told Kreuger and Picazzo that he saw no reason not to fire O'Shaughnessey if they felt O'Shaughnessey should be terminated, and that this was the time to do so. However, Moore could not recall who first used the word "termination" in this conversation.

While I credited Picazzo's testimony concerning this incident, especially in view of Kreuger's failure to be called as a witness to testify herein and for the other reasons set forth above, even assuming arguendo that Moore's version is credited, the record still fails to establish that Picazzo possessed and exercised the authority to effectively recommend the discharge of employees. The evidence tends to show that Moore made the final decision to discharge O'Shaughnessey, as he admittedly does with all terminations of employees, and not on the basis of a recommendation of termination by Picazzo, but more likely from Kreuger. Apparently Picazzo had spoken to Kreuger about O'Shaughnessey after which they both went to see Moore. Picazzo perceived that he could not go directly to Moore or take any action himself under the circumstances. Thus it would be Kreuger if anyone who recommended the discharge, and not Picazzo.

Finally, the Respondent asserts in its brief,

> . . . the assistant lead is also relied upon for supervision of safety in the plant. He is given the responsibility of assuring that the work area is properly maintained and that mechanical safety guards and equipment are functioning properly . . . . Further, he "initiates corrective action when necessary." [Emphasis added.]

Picazzo testified that he was assigned by Moore to the safety committee, but was never told specifically what his duties were, only to "sit in." At the safety meetings employees made suggestions about safety to Bob Gangel, who "headed" the committee, and who determined which safety repairs should be made. The Respondent offered no evidence to refute this.[100] Further, the record is devoid of any evidence that Picazzo ever initiated any safety corrective measures or actions as assistant leadman or safety committee member.

From all of the above, it is evident that Picazzo, as assistant leadman, acted only in a routine manner and as a conduit between employees and management. He does not hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, reward, or adjust grievances, and does not effectively recommend such action. And while he may "assign," "discipline," or "direct" employees, this requires no use of independent judgment on Picazzo's part, being merely of a routine or clerical nature. Based on the record as a whole, I find that a preponderance of the credible evidence does not establish that Ralph Picazzo was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, when he was discharged by the Respondent.[101] In view of the finding above, Picazzo is entitled to the protection of the Act and the rights guaranteed employees thereunder.[102]

[100] Gangel did not testify at the hearing.

[101] Although the parties' election stipulation provided for the inclusion of "leadpersons" and inferentially "assistant leadperson," and although Picazzo's name was contained in the Excelsior list given by the Respondent to a Board agent prior to the election, the Board and the courts have both held that such actions are not dispositive on the issue of supervisory status, that an employee's supervisory status must be determined upon a review of his duties and authority. See Teamsters Local 692 (Absco Distributing), 209 NLRB 1144 (1974); Great Western Broadcasting Corp., 139 NLRB 93 (1962); Montgomery Ward & Co., 115 NLRB 645 (1956), enfd. 242 F.2d 497 (2d Cir. 1957); Valentine Sugars, 102 NLRB 313 (1953). Finally, in A & B Cartage, Inc., 256 NLRB 14 (1981), the Board ruled that the parties' election stipulation was not dispositive on the issue of supervisory status, even where the employees in question were named in a Norris-Thermador list agreed to by the parties.

However, the question of the Respondent's good-faith approach to the Board's elective process must suffer some skepticism when the record discloses that, despite the above, the Respondent now asserts that all leadmen and Picazzo as an assistant leadman were supervisors within the meaning of the Act. These employees, George Kreuger, production leadman; Picazzo, production assistant leadman and maintenance leadman; Pat Patterson, production leadman, night shift; Jerry Colvard, shipping leadman; and Robert Gangel, toolroom leadman, included as a class of employees in the stipulated unit and in the Excelsior list, voted unchallenged by the Respondent at the election except for Picazzo, with the Union accepting the Respondent's implied assertion by its actions at the representation stage of these proceedings that they were not supervisors under the Act. Moreover, the silence of the Respondent's representatives when asked by the Board's agent as to the supervisory status of Picazzo and Jerry Colvard when they were selected by the Union as its election observers reinforces this skepticism and doubt.

I have reviewed the cases cited by the Respondent in its brief to support its allegation that Picazzo was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act, and find each to be distinguishable from the instant case. For example, in Earle M. Jorgensen Co., 240 NLRB 1296 (1979), "working foremen," found to be supervisors, not only oversee the work of other employees and daily assign them to their jobs, but have also transferred employees from "one bay to another," investigate job accidents, and make appropriate recommendations to management, handle grievances, and apparently have some discretion with regard to disciplining employees and assigning overtime work. Clearly Picazzo's duties as "assistant leadman," while in part similar to that of the "working foremen," differs substantially and pertinently.

In Earle Industries, 146 NLRB 536 (1964), the employees held to be supervisors and "whose duties were virtually identical to Picazzo's" as asserted by the Respondent, also changed employee work assignments "with employer acquiescence" held himself out as having authority "to discipline and responsibly direct employees work, recommended retention of an emloyee successfully, and in other ways recommended and affected employee working conditions such as salary increases, time off, and discharge."

In Simpson Electric Co., 250 NLRB 309 (1980), the compared employee effectively recommended actions to be taken based on her evaluations of employees' work, in contrast to Picazzo's duties as to evaluating the employees and the use made by the Responent of these evaluations. The other cases cited by the Respondent are in the same vein and are also clearly distinguishable when carefully read and considered.

3. Acts of interference, restraint, and coercion

Section 8(a)(1) of the Act prohibits an employer from interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

The complaint alleges that the Respondent threatened Picazzo with discharge if he continued to campaign on behalf of the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Respondent denies this allegation.

The evidence reveals that Picazzo first learned about the Union's organizing campaign at the Respondent's facility from other employees after the representation petition had been filed. Prior to the election, Picazzo attended union meetings and signed an authorization card for the Union. Picazzo also engaged in discussions with other employees in which he campaigned for the Union. Although the Respondent campaigned against the Union,[103] it was unaware that Picazzo was campaigning for the Union among its employees until about 10 days before the scheduled election when, according to Moore, he was informed by Jerry Colvard and Steven Kosiek that Picazzo was the one "pushing" for the Union, was "the source of the problem," and was "campaigning for the union on company time."[104]

Thereafter, on October 29, 1981, Moore approached Picazzo in the plant and engaged him in a conversation with no one else being present at the time. Picazzo testified that Moore told him that "if I continued to campaign for the union, that he would have me fired, and if I did not believe that, just to continue and he would see me in court." He stated that, later that same day, Moore again approached him and said that "he really didn't mean it quite that way. But that if, in fact, I was campaigning for the union, that he could have me fired." Picazzo maintained that these constituted the only occasions when Moore had discussed with him his campaigning for the Union. Picazzo continued that Moore had never said anything to him about his "campaigning on company time." He added that Moore did not explain why he could not campaign for the Union, nor why he could be fired if he did so.

Moore, on the other hand, testified that approximately a week before the election,[105] he warned Picazzo that, "apparently from the indications I had heard he was campaigning for the union on company time, and told him that I would appreciate it if he would desist or refuse to do that, and he could be subject to dismissal if he continued."[106] According to Moore, his second conversation with Picazzo occurred 3 or 4 days before the election and not later that same day, October 29, 1981, as alleged by Picazzo. Moore related that he told Picazzo that he understood that Picazzo was "still campaigning for the union on company time," and requested that Picazzo "discontinue that activity." Moore stated that he "indicated that [Picazzo] would be subject to termination, and that I didn't feel it was right what he was doing." Moore added that he used a more heated tone in this later conversation than he had in the first because he felt "betrayed" and "was annoyed because he was continuing to campaign for the union on company time." Moore also admitted that he had not explained to Picazzo why he thought Picazzo's actions were not "right."

While it is extremely difficult to decide whose testimony is to be credited since there were no other parties present during these conversations and, in connection therewith, only superficial circumstances and factors on which to base a finding, yet, as will become clear hereinafter, it really makes no difference either way concerning the resolution of this particular issue.

Generally, an employer engages in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by requiring that employees refrain from engaging in union activities or by threatening employees with discharge if they did not cease their union activities. Correlative to this is the governing principle that a rule is presumptively invalid if it prohibits solicitation on the employee's own time.[107] "Working time is for work" is a long-accepted maxim of labor relations.[108] The Board, in its recent decision in Our Way, Inc., 268 NLRB 394 (1983), signaled a return to the rules enunciated in Essex International, 211 NLRB 749 (1974), concerning employee solicitation on company premises. In Essex International, "the Board made clear that rules using 'working hours' are presumptively invalid because that term connotes periods from the beginning to the end of workshifts, periods that include the employees' own time. The Board also held, in contrast, that rules using 'working time' are presumptively valid because that term connotes periods when employees are performing actual job duties, periods which do not include the employees' own time such as lunch and break periods."[109] In Florida Steel Corp., 215 NLRB 97 (1974), the Board found that a rule using the term "company time" was unduly ambiguous and restrictive and presumptively invalid, comparing it to the rule prohibiting solicitation "during working hours," appearing in Essex International.[110]

These presumptions, which concern the facial validity or invalidity of no-solicitation rules, can be rebutted by appropriate evidence. For example, an employer could be shown to have unlawfully modified and applied a fa-

[103] The Respondent admits having campaigned against the Union prior to the election. Moreover, Picazzo testified uncontradictedly that Moore passed around "anti-union propaganda" in the plant. However, the distribution of antiunion material by an employer is not unlawful in itself absent some form of coercion or pressure upon an employee to receive the material. McDonald's, 214 NLRB 879 (1974); Farah Mfg. Co., 204 NLRB 173 (1973).

[104] While Kosiek denied that he had ever gone with Jerry Colvard to complain to Moore about Picazzo's union activities, he did testify that he had been in Moore's office when a janitor, Karl Bernsten, had mentioned to Moore that Picazzo was campaigning on behalf of the Union among the employees.

[105] Since the election was held on November 5, 1981, Moore's recollection that the first conversation occurred about a week before the election substantially agrees with that of Picazzo.

[106] Moore could not recall the specific words he used in this conversation, but that what he testified to herein constituted the gist of what he had said to Picazzo.

cially valid rule, or an employer could show that he communicated or applied an invalid "working hours" rule in such a way as to convey an intent clearly to permit solicitation during breaktime or other periods when employees are not actively at work.[111] Additionally, the presumptions can be rebutted by an employer's showing that a no-solicitation rule "was justified by a need to maintain discipline or production in its plant." Additionally, the presumptions can be rebutted by an employer's showing that a no-solicitation rule "was justified by a need to maintain discipline or production in its plant."[112]

Applying the above standards to the facts present in the instant case, I conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act whether Moore threatened to discharge Picazzo if he failed to discontinue campaigning for the Union or, alternately, whether he warned Picazzo that he would be terminated if he continued to campaign for the Union on "company time." In either case, Moore's statements constitute overly broad prohibitions on Picazzo's union activity. The Respondent offered no evidence to show that Moore or anyone else explained to Picazzo that he was permitted to campaign during nonworking periods without being subject to disciplinary action. Nor did the Respondent offer evidence to show that its no-solicitation prohibition was justified by a need to maintain discipline or production at the plant. Accordingly, I find that the Respondent interfered with, restrained, and coerced Picazzo in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act and has thereby violated Section 8(a)(1).[113]

4. The discharge of Ralph Picazzo

Section 8(a)(3) of the Act prohibits an employer from discriminating against his employees in regard to hire, tenure, and other terms and conditions of employment for the purpose of encouraging or discouraging membership in a labor organization.

The complaint herein alleges that the Respondent discharged Ralph Picazzo and failed and refused to reinstate him to his former position of employment because he joined or assisted the Union or engaged in other protected concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The Respondent denies these allegations and contends that Picazzo was discharged for cause.

Direct evidence of a purpose to discriminate is rarely obtained, especially as employers acquire some sophistication about the rights of their employees under the Act, but such purposes may be established by circumstantial evidence.[114] Under the law, if discrimination against an employee is motivated by union considerations, it constitutes a violation of the Act. Direct evidence of discriminatory motivation is not necessary to support a finding of unlawful discrimination and such intent may be inferred from the record as a whole.[115]

Ralph Picazzo was discharged by the Respondent on November 10, 1981. Picazzo's version of his conversation with Moore occurring at the time of his termination differed from that given by Moore. While Williams was also present during this conversation, he was not called as a witness to testify herein.

According to Picazzo, Moore advised him that he was being terminated because the Respondent "could not condone intimidating or threatening employees." Picazzo stated that Moore refused to disclose the names of the employees whom he had allegedly intimidated or threatened, the nature of the threats made or the intimidation, nor when these incidents had allegedly occurred, although Picazzo requested such information. Picazzo related that Moore neither asked him anything about any purported conversation with other employees nor gave Picazzo an opportunity to explain any of the circumstances of the allegations made during this conversation. Picazzo added that he had no idea at the time what Moore was referring to when he said that Picazzo had threatened and intimidated employees.

Moore testified that he told Picazzo that he was being discharged, "Inasmuch as you have continued to push for the Union on Company time and threatened and coerced employees." Moore stated that Picazzo said, "I have been expecting it." Moore added that if Picazzo had engaged in union activity only, without having also threatened and coerced employees, the Respondent would not have discharged him.

The General Counsel asserts in his brief that, "regardless of which version of Picazzo's discharge is credited, the termination was unlawful." I do not agree.[116] With [113] The record also discloses that the Respondent maintains a no-solicitation rule in its employee handbook which forbids "solicitations of any kind . . . on company property . . . during working hours." Under the holding in Our Way, Inc., such a rule is presumptively invalid. However, inasmuch as the General Counsel does not allege a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act in connection therewith, nor does the record show that, despite the failure to allege such a violation in the complaint, this issue was fully considered and explored at the hearing, with evidence offered thereon, I will make no finding concerning this. [116] However, I do agree, assuming arguendo, that if Picazzo was discharged by the Respondent because he campaigned for the Union on company time, his termination would be unlawful. As found above, the Respondent's no-solicitation rule was invalid as being overly broad. I also found that Moore's threats that Picazzo would be discharged if he did not discontinue campaigning for the Union on company time were unlawful and violative of the Act. Therefore, it must be presumed that the Respondent's employees were free to behave as though no rule existed. And it is well settled that, absent any rule, talking about a union during working time is protected activity unless shown to be otherwise. See Gulf Envelope Co., 256 NLRB 320 (1981); Punchito's, 228 NLRB 136 (1977), enfd. 581 F.2d 204, 207 fn. 3 (9th Cir. 1978); Catalyst, 230 NLRB 355 (1977), enfd. 581 F.2d 215 (9th Cir. 1978). regard to this conversation, I credit Picazzo's account of what was said therein. The failure of the Respondent to call Williams as a witness, although he was present during this conversation and presumably could either corroborate Moore's testimony or contradict Picazzo's, must be construed to weigh heavily against the Respondent.[117] Additionally, Moore admitted having made various statements during the conversation, as alleged by Picazzo in his testimony, which tends to support Picazzo's version thereof.[118] Moreover, Moore's testimony that Picazzo would not have been terminated but for his having threatened and coerced employees implies that Picazzo's campaigning for the Union on company time allegedly played little part in the Respondent's determination to discharge him. Why then would Moore have any reason to assert to Picazzo that this was part of the cause of his discharge?[119]

The Respondent's actual alleged reason for discharging Picazzo is that he threatened and intimidated or coerced employees. It is evident that the Respondent contends that Picazzo engaged in such conduct while soliciting other employees to support the Union. In NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, Inc., 379 U.S. 21, 23 (1964), the Supreme Court of the United States held,

> Over and again the Board has ruled that Section 8(a)(2) is violated if an employee is discharged for misconduct arising out of a protected activity, despite the employer's good faith, when it is shown that the misconduct never occurred. . . . In sum, Section 8(a)(1) is violated if it is shown that the discharged employee was at the time engaged in a protected activity, that the employer knew it was such, that the basis of the discharge was an alleged act of misconduct in the course of that activity, and that the employee was not, in fact, guilty of that misconduct.

Moreover, if it is shown that the Respondent discharged Picazzo in such circumstances with an antiunion motivation, then the Respondent has also violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.[120] The fact that the Respondent may have had a good-faith belief that Picazzo had engaged in misconduct in connection with his union activities does not constitute a defense to the violation, if, in truth, Picazzo had not engaged in such misconduct.[121] However, the burden of going forward with evidence to prove that Picazzo did not, in fact, engage in the misconduct alleged is on the General Counsel.[122]

The record evidence shows that the Respondent, through Moore, had knowledge that Picazzo was engaged in protected activity, that of soliciting other employees to support the Union. Moore acknowledged that he had been advised by other employees that Picazzo was engaging in union activity at the plant. Additionally, Moore accused Picazzo of campaigning for the Union on company time and of engaging in misconduct by threatening and coercing employees in the course of such activity. Moreover, there is sufficient evidence in the record to support a finding that the Respondent has a "good-faith belief" that Picazzo had engaged in this misconduct during his union activity. After Moore learned that Picazzo had allegedly threatened employees Larry Colvard, Mark Freeland, and Brent Yankee, he investigated the incidents by questioning the employees who had registered the complaints against Picazzo, and by interviewing the threatened employees themselves, to confirm what had been reported. Moore also discussed the incidents with the Respondent's attorney and in one instance, with the Respondent's "general manager in Chicago," before concluding that the complaints against Picazzo were valid and that Picazzo should be terminated. I therefore find that the Respondent "honestly believed" that Picazzo had threatened employees while soliciting their support for the Union, an activity which, without the alleged threats, would otherwise have been protected.[123]

I am aware that Moore did not afford Picazzo an opportunity to present his version of the incidents alleged.[124] Nor would Moore disclose to Picazzo the names of either the employees who had reported the incidents or the names of the employees who had allegedly been threatened, or the nature of the alleged threats, or when they occurred.[125] However, Moore explained that he had refused to divulge this information to Picazzo because he feared for the safety of the employees involved. I believe Moore as to this, despite my having credited Picazzo's testimony over Moore's as to what was said during their conversation.[126] The very nature of the threats allegedly made against employees, at least in part, involved the threat of physical harm;[127] and there is evidence in the record that soon after Yankee disclosed Picazzo's threat against him, the windows of his automobile were shattered. Additionally, the Respondent posted a security guard at the plant during Yankee's work shift.

[117] See fn. 78 herein.

[118] Moore admitted that he had told Picazzo that the Respondent would not contest his unemployment insurance claim and that he would provide Picazzo with a letter of recommendation if requested, although, in fact, the Respondent did subsequently oppose Picazzo's claim for unemployment insurance benefits.

[119] However, as will be more fully discussed hereinafter, I believe that, in fact, Picazzo's union activity was a motivating factor in his being discharged by the Respondent, along with the Respondent's belief that he was guilty of misconduct while so engaged in these activities. As for now, note Moore's testimony that he "failed to see the difference" between Picazzo's campaigning for the Union on company time and his having allegedly threatened and coerced employees, "since the basis of the threats related to a [union] campaign."

[126] As Judge Learned Hand stated in NLRB v. Universal Camera Corp., 179 F.2d 749, 754 (2d Cir. 1950), "It is no reason for refusing to accept everything that a witness says, because you do not believe all of it; nothing is more common in all kinds of judicial decisions than to believe some and not all."

[127] Picazzo had threatened to "kill" Yankee, and had told Larry Colvard that the antiunion employees would have their "heads busted."

The above supports the reasonability of Moore's explanation.[128]

In view of the above, the remaining factor to be examined under the Burnup & Sims guidelines is whether, in fact, Picazzo was guilty of the alleged misconduct. The misconduct, asserted by the Respondent as the cause of Picazzo's discharge, involved threats allegedly made by Picazzo against employees Brent Yankee, Mark Freeland, and Larry Colvard. Picazzo denied, "as far as he knew," having threatened any employee.

Briefly, since the conversation between Picazzo and Yankee has been set forth fully above, Yankee testified that about 3 or 4 days before the Board's election, Picazzo told him that if the Union won the election, the employees would receive "some benefits . . . medical and all that," and that it would therefore "be better to vote for the union." According to Yankee, at the end of the conversation Picazzo warned him that "if you tell anyone what I've told you, I'll get you, I'll kill you." Yankee related that while he did not think that Picazzo's threat was made seriously, Picazzo had "acted like he was serious somewhat." Yankee added that he reported the conversation to his supervisor, Pat Patterson, requesting that Patterson not tell anyone else about it because he did not want anyone to get "hurt" or "in trouble."[129] Moore testified that, after he was apprised of Picazzo's threat to Yankee, he spoke to Yankee about this the following day, and Yankee told him that he was "afraid to come to work" that day. As a result of this incident the Respondent posted a security guard on Yankee's work shift.

Larry Colvard and Mark Freeland both testified that Yankee had told them, sometime during the week before the election, that Picazzo had threatened him saying, "I'm going to kill you." Colvard related that he told this to his brother, Jerry Colvard, because he had also been threatened by Picazzo and "Because already up to that time, if I'm not mistaken, Brent's car window had been smashed out, stuff like this. There was little things written on the bathroom walls about us. All over. It was just the atmosphere of the company." Freeland testified that Yankee said that Picazzo had threatened him "about saying things to his supervisors, because word had gotten out about the things that were being said, and Brent was rather shaken up at the time . . . he said something about threatening violence." Freeland added that Yankee had also told him that Picazzo had made the threat because someone had reported to a supervisor that Picazzo was campaigning for the Union at the plant.

Picazzo recalled having a conversation with Brent Yankee "two days" before the election. While his account of what was said both differs and is similar in part to Yankee's version thereof, most relevant is Picazzo's denial that he threatened to kill Yankee if Yankee told anyone about what was said during their conversation. Picazzo testified, "And then in my closing statement, I told him, be careful who you talk to." Picazzo stated that he made this latter remark to Yankee because there were rumors circulating through the plant that "heads will roll," that certain employees would be losing their jobs, a "general belief that apparently Don Moore was going to get even."[130]

The General Counsel in his brief submits that it is more reasonable to believe Picazzo's testimony with regard to this conversation than Yankee's. I do not agree and therefore credit Yankee's account of what Picazzo said concerning the "threat." The evidence herein fails to disclose any reason or rational basis for supposing that Yankee would report to his supervisor that Picazzo had threatened to kill him, then tell fellow employees Larry Colvard and Mark Freeland the same thing, if such a threat had not, in fact, been actually made. Additionally, between the testimony of Yankee and Picazzo concerning the language used by Picazzo to caution Yankee against telling others about the contents of their conversation, their versions thereof are so different as to preclude the chance of Yankee misconstruing or mishearing the words so that, what Picazzo might have said was phrased differently and in a nonthreatening manner. Moreover, I was impressed with the demeanor and forthrightness of Mark Freeland as a witness, and this, in addition to the other reasons given for crediting his testimony on another issue discussed herein, leads me to credit his testimony in full, which supports Yankee's version of the threatening language used by Picazzo rather than Picazzo's.[131] It should also be noted that employee Dale Scott, called as a witness for the Charging Party, testified that the employees at the plant had heard that Brent Yankee and other employees had been threatened. On consideration of the record as a whole, and the testimony of Yankee, Freeland, Colvard, Moore, and Scott as opposed to that of Picazzo, I find that Picazzo did threaten Brent Yankee as alleged herein.

Regarding the alleged threats made by Picazzo against Mark Freeland, Freeland testified that prior to the election Picazzo told him that it would be "wiser" for Freeland to support the Union since the Union was sure to win the election and "if Freeland was a no vote, that [he] would be making waves and everything, and it would be rough for [him]." Freeland continued that Picazzo had also told him that if the Union came in, the [128] See NLRB v. Charles Batchelder Co., 646 F.2d 33, 40 (2d Cir. 1981). It should also be noted that the General Counsel, in his brief, does not dispute the Respondent's "good-faith belief" that Picazzo had engaged in misconduct while campaigning for the Union.

[129] In this vein, Yankee testified, "I know Ralph [Picazzo]. He used to be my leadman. I don't know if he would do anything, but people can get greedy sometimes. . . . I didn't want to get in a hassle over it; you know, a fight or anything, you know, with the other guys and get my car broken, my windows broken, like I did have happen after I did—after Pat mentioned it I ended up getting my windows broken and stuff."

[130] This is unbelievable. Why would Moore have reason to "get even" with Yankee, who was against the Union anyway, since there is no evidence in the record even suggesting that Moore believed that Yankee would change his mind in opposing the Union.

[131] See fn. 126 herein. The General Counsel points up the following to support his submission that Picazzo's testimony should be believed: that Picazzo did not also threaten Colvard and Freeland with physical harm when he told them not to repeat the contents of their conversations to Moore, Williams, or Jerry Colvard; that neither Moore and the Colvards, nor Freeland ever accused Picazzo to his face of threatening to kill Yankee although they knew about the threat; and that Picazzo took no action against any individual whom he knew to be opposed to the Union even though he had the opportunity to do so. For obvious reasons, none of the above is persuasive in supporting the General Counsel's submission as to credibility.

Respondent would discharge Freeland's half-brother, Jerry Colvard, "rather than making Jerry a management position . . . because they wouldn't want to pay him the wages that he would deserve." Freeland added that, soon after the election and the Union's victory therein, he approached Picazzo and asked if there were anything he could do to get in the Union's good graces and Picazzo told him that he was a "fuck-up," and had better watch himself because he was "on the wrong side of the fence, and things could get rough, you know, as far as my job went, because I was a no vote, and I just was not for the union at all."[132]

Picazzo testified that before the election, during a conversation with Freeland, Freeland asked him if the rumors concerning Jerry Colvard were valid as to Colvard's "standing" and "working position" with the Respondent. Picazzo stated that he responded, "[A]s far as I know, it is just a rumor, that I did not know if it was true or not." Picazzo could not recall anything else that was said during this conversation. However, Picazzo denied that he had threatened Freeland or that he had told Freeland that after the election Colvard would be gone. Picazzo continued that one day after the election Freeland asked him what he could "expect" in view of the Union's victory in the election and Picazzo answered, "[T]hat now we just have to wait and see, you know, what happens afterward. It is totally up . . . to the negotiations." Picazzo denied having called Freeland a "fuck-up," or having threatened Freeland with the loss of his job if he did not support the Union.

For the reasons previously advanced herein with regard to the credibility of Mark Freeland, and further because Freeland testified in a clear and unequivocal manner throughout his testimony, I credit his account of what was said over that given by Picazzo.[133]

The General Counsel asserts in his brief that "it is more reasonable to regard Picazzo's statements to Freeland about watching himself as warnings made in an effort to protect Freeland rather than as threats to coerce him to support the Union." I do not agree. While it is true, as pointed to by the General Counsel, that prior to the election Picazzo had, on several occasions, warned Freeland to watch himself because additional warnings concerning his absenteeism and his failure to comply with company safety rules would result in his termination, yet, according to Picazzo's own testimony, most of these warnings were generated by the Respondent's management and/or supervisors, with Picazzo functioning merely as the conduit between management and Freeland. Moreover, it is apparent that these warnings were not given to Freeland in order to protect him in his job, but to serve as warning notice that if he did not maintain proper performance in his employment habits, he would be discharged. In considering Picazzo's admonition to Freeland, to the effect that he would be "wise" to support the Union because it was sure to win the election, and if he voted against the Union things could get "rough" for him, it is obvious that this warning clearly constituted a threat to vote for the Union or else, and Freeland perceived it to be so. In no way can Picazzo's statements be interpreted, under the circumstances present in this case, as having been made to protect Freeland rather than to coerce him into supporting the Union.[134]

In further support of the above is the evidence showing that, soon after the Union had won the election, Freeland approached Picazzo and asked what he could do to get on the Union's good side. If Freeland had not taken Picazzo's warning seriously, why would he do this? The only reasonable explanation is that in view of Picazzo's threat that a "no-vote" would lead to Freeland experiencing problems as to his job, even including retention thereof, Freeland sought to circumvent this by perhaps ingratiating himself with the Union through Picazzo's suggestions or advice, to mend his fences so to speak. Moreover, Picazzo's response to Freeland illuminates the intent of his previous warning to Freeland. Picazzo told Freeland in no uncertain terms that he was vulnerable as to discharge, and would thereafter have to be careful, "because I was on the wrong side of the fence and things could get rough . . . as far as my job went, because I was a no vote, and I just was not for the Union at all."[135]

Additionally, the General Counsel in his brief asserts that Picazzo's statements to Freeland regarding Jerry Colvard "were couched in speculative terms and did not constitute threats." However, these statements must be considered in the light of what was occurring at the time. Picazzo's statement that Colvard would "be gone" when the Union came in because the Respondent would not want to place him in a "management position" makes sense only in the context of Colvard's notorious antiunion position. Since rumor had it that the Respondent [132] The evidence indicates that it was common knowledge at the plant that Mark Freeland, as well as Jerry Colvard and Larry Colvard, was opposed to the Union. However, Larry Colvard did testify that Freeland at times wavered as to his opposition to union representation.

[133] It should also be noted that Freeland's testimony was consistent with Moore's account of what Freeland had told him when Moore "investigated" the threats alleged to have been made by Picazzo against Freeland. Moreover, employee Dale Scott, called as a witness for the Charging Party, testified that prior to the election he had heard around the plant that someone had threatened Brent Yankee, Mark Freeland, and Larry Colvard, although Picazzo's name had not been "tied in with the threats."

[134] Picazzo was perhaps the Union's strongest adherent among the Respondent's employees at the plant while Freeland, along with his half brothers in the warehouse, Jerry and Larry Colvard, was known to oppose the Union. Additionally, there is no evidence in the record that Picazzo and Freeland were fast friends giving Picazzo some reason to protect Freeland.

[135] The fact that Picazzo refrained from issuing written warning notices to Freeland or other employees during the period immediately prior to the election or thereafter does not detract from the intimidating or coercive nature of Picazzo's threats nor support the General Counsel's contention that Picazzo did not engage in such conduct. Various reasons for Picazzo's failure to do so come to mind, i.e., Picazzo might have felt that his threats to Freeland were sufficient to change his mind about voting against the Union and if Freeland's discharge were effectuated by the Respondent before the election, what good were the threats. Moreover, according to Picazzo, written warnings were usually initiated by Williams or perhaps Kreuger so that Picazzo's opportunity to issue a "write-up" to Freeland after the election and before his discharge did not present itself. Be that as it may, I am not persuaded that Picazzo's failure to take such action either supports Picazzo's version of what he said or his alleged lack of intent to intimidate and coerce Freeland. The courts and the Board have often realized the effectiveness of threats as coercive and intimidating without the actual accomplishment of the threatened action.

would not promote Colvard to a managerial position, and therefore he would be let go, Picazzo's statements strongly suggest that the Respondent would be compelled to discharge Colvard under union pressure since the Union would oppose his membership in its ranks because of his antiunion stance and he therefore could not presumably remain as an employee under the collective-bargaining agreement's union-security clause to be negotiated thereafter. Moreover, it is highly unlikely that the Respondent would discharge an employee who was known to be opposed to union representation and in support of its own position regarding the Union unless somehow compelled to do so.[136] The reasonable inference to be drawn from all of Picazzo's statements to Freeland was that after the Union won the election, those employees, including Freeland, who had failed to support the Union would be punished, including "rough" working conditions and possible loss of jobs, and that Jerry Colvard, known as antiunion, would be terminated no matter what. The threat and the menace inherent in Picazzo's statements become patently clear under the circumstances present in this case.

With regard to Picazzo's alleged threats to Larry Colvard, Colvard testified that, prior to the election, he and Picazzo had discussed the Union occasionally but, "as the election drew near," these discussions became more frequent. According to Colvard, Picazzo told him that when the Union won the election, his brother Jerry Colvard "would be gone."[137] While Colvard maintained that Picazzo had not actually threatened him with any reprisals if he failed to support the Union, nor had he heard Picazzo threaten any other employees, he still felt threatened by Picazzo, "[E]ven if he never said a word . . . he did enough that I thought about it . . . I was worried about my job . . . My job security was threatened." Colvard related, "I figured that if he has got enough power to get my brother out of there, he's got enough power to get me of out there. I'd only been there two months." Colvard continued that a few days after the Union won the election, Picazzo told him that, "I'm going to enjoy this a lot. Heads are going to roll. The guys who talk for the company are going to get their heads busted."[138] Colvard added that he then related to his brother Jerry what Picazzo had said to him. Moore testified that after he had been informed about Picazzo's threats to Larry Colvard, he spoke to Colvard who said that "[Picazzo] has got me all shook up," and that he appeared to be "afraid of losing [his] job."

Picazzo denied having told Colvard that, after the Union won the election, his brother Jerry would be fired. However, Picazzo did admit telling Colvard and/or other employees about a "rumor" to the effect that the Respondent for its own reasons, not arising out of the Union's organizational campaign and ultimate success therein, would discharge Jerry Colvard after the election. Picazzo testified that, after the election, he had a conversation with Larry Colvard and, although he could not recall exactly what was said, he recollected that Colvard and another employee, Young, asked him about rumors circulating at the plant that some employees were scheduled by the Respondent for discharge, including Jerry Colvard.[139] Additionally, while Picazzo admitted that he passed along to the other employees the rumors that "heads will roll" and that "people will lose their jobs," which he also maintained was common knowledge among the plant employees, he denied ever having threatened any employee with physical harm or loss of employment if he failed to support the Union.

The General Counsel asserts that Colvard's testimony is unworthy of belief because it evidenced an inconsistency with his "pre-trial affidavit," and because Colvard was evasive while testifying on cross-examination as to whether or not Picazzo had threatened him personally. While it is true Colvard did testify that he never told Picazzo, during their conversations, whether he was for or against the Union, and in his affidavit he states that he did so, Colvard seemed genuinely confused about this since he testified soon thereafter, "I probably told everybody I was opposed to it at one time." This appears to be the only inconsistency therein and the evidence herein shows that it was common knowledge at the plant that Jerry and Larry Colvard and Mark Freeland were opposed to the Union.

As to Colvard's alleged evasiveness on cross-examination, it should be remembered that he testified that, while Picazzo had not personally threatened him directly, he still felt threatened because of Picazzo's statements concerning his brother Jerry's future employment with the Respondent, and about Picazzo's general statement concerning the discharge of those employees who had failed to support the Union. It appeared to me that what is alleged as "evasiveness" was actually Colvard's attempt to make his position known while attempting to answer the [136] Whatever the legality of this under court and Board law, it should be remembered that the Respondent's employees are laymen and cannot be presumed to have knowledge and familiarity with the nuances of labor law. Moreover, Picazzo's position with the Union, as perceived by the employees, was one of strength and influence thereby enforcing any inferences Picazzo might raise in his statements which could conceivably be construed by them to be of an intimidating and coercive nature, especially threats intimating that their jobs were in jeopardy if they failed to support the Union.

[137] In his affidavit given to a Board agent, Colvard stated that Picazzo "made it sound like" the Respondent would be compelled to discharge his brother Jerry because he was a "wage-earner" like the other employees and would be subject to the provision of any collective-bargaining agreement executed between the Respondent and the Union; and since the Union would not allow Jerry Colvard into its membership because of his opposition to the Union, and the Respondent would not promote Colvard to a managerial position for its own reasons, Colvard would be discharged pursuant to the provisions of such an agreement.

[138] Colvard testified that another employee, Charles Young, was present when this conversation took place. Neither the Respondent nor the General Counsel called Young as a witness.

[139] Larry Colvard denied that there was any rumor at the plant prior to the election that a number of employees were going to be discharged. He also denied asking Picazzo if his brother Jerry's name was on any list of employees to be fired. While the Charging Party called two witnesses who were employed at the time relevant thereto, Ruben Vasquez and Scott, neither confirmed the rumor about an alleged employee discharge list, although Scott did testify that, prior to the election, employees were betting on how long Jerry Colvard would retain his employment with the Respondent after the election was held. It should be noted that this latter testimony by Scott could readily be perceived to imply that Jerry Colvard would be discharged when the Union won the election for the reason that he was antiunion as asserted by Larry Colvard in his affidavit and implied in Mark Freeland's testimony as stated above.

questions posed in a truthful and complete manner. It is not uncommon, and I have observed this in other cases, wherein a witness who is unsophisticated in thought and expression, and with little or no experience in testifying under oath at a trial, will have difficulty in the context of answering questions properly because of a feeling that he is not being afforded the opportunity to fully tell his story. I believe that this is what created a problem in Colvard's mind as to how to answer the questions asked, and translated into what the General Counsel perceived to be evasiveness on his part.

Be that as it may, I credit Colvard's testimony over that of Picazzo's for the reason that it was supported by other credible evidence in the record, including the testimony of other witnesses,[140] and because it appears that Picazzo has a greater stake in the outcome of these proceedings than does Colvard, and because although the testimony of Yankee, Freeland, Colvard and Moore could have been contrived as to Picazzo's alleged threats to employees, and that of Picazzo truthful, yet "if there was fabrication, it would seem more probable that it was the one, rather than the four, who was lying."[141]

From all of the above, I find and conclude that Ralph Picazzo did threaten employees as set forth above thereby engaging in misconduct in the course of his union activities.

As indicated above, under Burnup & Sims, supra, an employer who discharges an employee engaged in a protected activity known to the employer as such, the basis of the discharge being an alleged act of misconduct in the course of the activity, violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, where the employee, in fact, was not guilty of such misconduct. This is true even where the employer has acted in good faith.[142] The Supreme Court in NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21, 22 (1964), stated further,

> We find it unnecessary to reach the questions raised under Section 8(a)(3) for we are of the view that in the context of this record Section 8(a)(1) was plainly violated, whatever the employer's motive.[2]

[2] . . . The Court of Appeals, however, rejected without discussion this suggestion of the existence of anti-union bias. . . . In its petition for writ of certiorari the Board expressly stated that "The propriety of this action [by the Court of Appeals] is not questioned here." In light of this concession it is unnecessary for us to determine whether the Board's alternative finding of a discriminatory motivation is supported by substantial evidence.

Therefore, where the discharged employee had not, in fact, engaged in the alleged misconduct during his protected activities the discharge is violative of the Act.[143] But where the employee has engaged in the misconduct alleged, the discharge is not unlawful where the basis of the discharge is, in fact, an "alleged act of misconduct."[144] Moreover, where the discharged employee has not engaged in the alleged misconduct and it is found that the real reason for the discharge was his/her union activity, the alleged misconduct being seized upon by the employer as a pretext for discharge, such discharge constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.[145]

The Respondent herein asserts that it discharged Ralph Picazzo because he engaged in acts of misconduct during his union activities. Although the General Counsel has failed to meet the burden of demonstrating that the misconduct alleged did not in fact occur, the evidence herein establishing that it did, the record evidence also clearly shows that the Respondent had another reason for discharging Picazzo, that of his union activity. In connection therewith and immediately coming to mind is Moore's admission that Picazzo was discharged not only for his misconduct while engaged in union activity, but also for such activity which he believed was also unlawful, and Moore's unlawful threats to Picazzo to discontinue his "campaigning [pushing] for the Union on company time."

The Board, in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enunciated, > [W]e shall henceforth employ the following causation test in all cases alleging violation of Section 8(a)(3) or violation of Section 8(a)(1) turning on employer motivation. First, we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct.

The Supreme Court of the United States in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), approved the Board's Wright Line allocation of proof.

An appraisal of the entire record convinces me that the General Counsel made a prima facie showing that Ralph Picazzo's union activity was a motivating factor in the Respondent's decision to discharge him. The record evidence establishes that Picazzo actively supported the Union by campaigning on its behalf, that the Respondent was aware of his union activities and was unhappy about it,[146] and that the Respondent actively opposed the Union, its union animus evidenced by both lawful[147] and unlawful actions.[148] Moreover, the Respondent, through Moore, in effect admitted that Picazzo was discharged in part because of his union activities "on company [146] Moore testified that he was surprised when he learned of Picazzo's activities on behalf of the Union, "since the company had been kind of nice to him." Additionally, Moore unlawfully threatened to discharge Picazzo if he continued to campaign for the Union on company time.

[147] The evidence shows that the Respondent openly campaigned against the Union.

[148] As found above, the Respondent engaged in unlawful conduct in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act in connection with the Union's organizing campaign.

time."[149] From all of the foregoing, I find and conclude that the General Counsel made a prima facie showing that Ralph Picazzo's union activity was a motivating factor in the Respondent's decision to discharge him. This having been established and in accordance with the causation test enunciated by the Board in Wright Line, the burden of proof shifts to the Respondent to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place against Picazzo even in the absence of his union activity.

The Respondent asserts that Picazzo was discharged because he threatened and intimidated employees. That Picazzo did threaten employees and, as will be more fully discussed hereinafter, did intimidate them is obvious from the record in this case, and I so found hereinbefore. I have also concluded from the record evidence that the Respondent was motivated in discharging Picazzo by considerations of his union activity. Thus it must be determined whether the Respondent would have discharged Picazzo because he threatened and intimidated employees had he not been engaged in campaigning for the Union as well.

As stated in Twilight Haven, Inc., 235 NLRB 1337, 1342 (1978),

> . . . both the Board and the courts have granted considerable latitude to employees for argument and counterargument in preelection situations, recognizing the "strong emotions" generated by union activity. Thus, failure to exercise "finesse and gentility" in campaigning for or against representation will not serve to divest employees of their statutory protection. Cement Transport, Inc., 200 NLRB 841, 845–846 (1972), enfd. 490 F.2d 1024 (C.A. 6, 1974); see also N.L.R.B. v. Efco Manufacturing, Inc., 227 NLRB F.2d 675 (C.A. 1, 1955). "Meaningful protection in this situation must require that relatively minor incidents or misconduct, such as name-calling or somewhat ambiguous or veiled threats, do not remove the Act's protection from the perpetrator, or suffice to legitimize his discharge." Corriveau & Routhier Cement Block, Inc., 171 NLRB 787, 788 (1968), enforcement denied . . . 410 F.2d 347 (C.A. 1, 1969).

However, unambiguous threats of violence[150] and statements that job loss would result from an employee's failure to support a union[151] fall outside the sphere of protected conduct.

In the instant case the evidence shows that Picazzo threatened Brent Yankee, Mark Freeland, and Larry Colvard and that these threats, under the circumstances existing when made, reasonably tended to coerce and intimidate these employees in the exercise of the rights protected under the Act.[152] These were no minor incidents of misconduct, such as name-calling or somewhat ambiguous or veiled threats. The threats by Picazzo against Freeland were unequivocal and Freeland perceived them to be so as above stated. And while Picazzo's threats against Larry Colvard were not framed in language directly threatening him, the threats carried the clear implication that he would suffer the same fate as his brother Jerry Colvard, the loss of his job, if he failed to support the Union. It should be noted that Picazzo was an intelligent, able employee, more so than other employees involved, and as evidenced additionally by his being advanced to assistant leadman by the Respondent. It should also be noted that all the threats, except for the one against Brent Yankee and the general threat that "heads will roll" directed against the antiunion employees, were made to or concerned the warehouse employees, it being common knowledge at the plant that they all opposed the Union. Both Freeland and Larry Colvard testified that they were worried about retaining their job because of Picazzo's threats. Moore testified that they had expressed their fears to him on this subject when he questioned them about Picazzo's threats.

Moreover, Picazzo's threat to "kill" Yankee if he told anyone about Picazzo campaigning for the Union was not one to be taken lightly either, and so Yankee perceived it. While it is apparent that even Yankee did not believe that Picazzo would kill him for disclosing their conversation, it is equally clear that Yankee did feel that Picazzo was not above causing him some kind of physical harm or damage to his personal property. Also, while it is true that, in the context of a union organizing campaign, it is not unusual for a tense atmosphere to be present, with questioned loyalties and even some animosity between management and the employees, and between employees against fellow employees, the evidence herein shows that this is an instance where such atmosphere was highly charged and volatile. Threats were made by Picazzo against at least three or four employees of a serious nature. Yankee suffered damage to his car after it was learned that he had disclosed Picazzo's threats against him. And written on the bathroom walls at the Respondent's plant were threats against the "dog brothers," a name commonly attributed to Jerry and Larry Colvard, so that the threats were only thinly veiled as against whom they were directed. Moreover, the Respondent after being apprised of the threat to Yankee felt that its seriousness merited the provision of a security guard on Yankee's work shift.

From all of the above I find that Picazzo's misconduct in threatening employees was of a sufficient nature to justify his discharge as a reasonable exercise of management's prerogatives in conducting its business and I conclude that the Respondent would have discharged Picazzo for this misconduct even if he had not engaged in union activity.[153] Of some significance in supporting this conclusion is the fact that Picazzo was not summarily discharged when the Respondent first learned of his misconduct in threatening and intimidating employees. At least three instances of threats involving Picazzo and Yankee, and Freeland and Colvard occurred prior to the election but the Respondent did not take any action against Picazzo, despite the fact that it already knew about his union activities and in fact resented his actions on behalf of the Union. It was only after Picazzo continued on his course of threatening employees, occurring after the Union had won the election, that the Respondent finally discharged him.

[149] While I discredited Moore's testimony that he told Picazzo that he was being discharged in part because he had continued to campaign for the Union on company time, I believe his admission that in fact this was a consideration in the decision to terminate Picazzo.

Accordingly, I find that the Respondent has sustained its burden of demonstrating that the same action it took against Picazzo, that of discharging him, would have taken place even in the absence of any protected conduct on his part, the threats being outside the scope of the protection of the Act in any context. Moreover, from all of the above, I conclude that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Ralph Picazzo. I shall therefore recommend that the 8(a)(3) and (1) allegations of the complaint relative to Picazzo's discharge be dismissed.[154]

IV. THE OBJECTIONS TO THE ELECTION

As set forth above, a secret-ballot election was conducted by the Board on November 15, 1981, among the Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit. The official tally of ballots showed that 19 votes were cast in favor of the Union, 10 votes against the Union, and 1 ballot was challenged.[155] On November 12, 1981, the Respondent filed timely objections to the election. By Order dated February 8, 1982, the Board overruled the Respondent's Objections 1, 2, 4, 6, and 10 as recommended by the Regional Director for Region 21 in his Report on Objections. Regarding Objections 3, 5, 7, 8, and 9, the Regional Director found that these objections relate to threats and other coercive conduct allegedly engaged in by Ralph Picazzo, "whom the Employer asserts to be a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act." The Regional Director also found that "these objections revealed substantial and material issues of fact," closely related to the issues involved in the instant unfair labor practice case, and concluded that "these objections can best be resolved in a hearing with the related issues of the complaint."[156]

In substance, Objections 3 and 5 alleged that "Supervisor Picazzo" threatened employees with physical and economic harm, and the loss of their jobs if they did not support the Union, and if the employees told other employees or management officials about Picazzo's statements regarding the Union. Objection 7 alleges that "Supervisor Picazzo informed a bargaining unit employee that his brother, a lead man, would be fired if the Union won the election." Objection 8 alleges that "Supervisor Picazzo," after "openly supporting and campaigning" for the Union, and making the threats alleged above, "acted as an observer for the Union during the election, thereby creating an atmosphere of fear, coercion and domination during the election process." Objection 9 asserts that "Such an atmosphere of domination, fear and coercion prevailed due to the participation of the supervisor in the period proceeding the voting. As a result of this participation, the election was held in an atmosphere of fear and reprisal which was not conducive to a rational uncoerced choice of the bargaining representative."

In Zeiglers Refuse Collectors v. NLRB, 639 F.2d 1000, 1004–1005 (3d Cir. 1981), the court of appeals stated:

> The purpose of holding representation elections is to provide a means whereby workers may fairly and freely choose their bargaining representative if indeed they want one. See NLRB v. A. J. Tower Co. [329 U.S. 324 (1946)]. A representation election should be "a laboratory in which an experiment may be conducted, under conditions as nearly ideal as possible, to determine the uninhibited desires of the employees." General Shoe Corp., 77 NLRB 124, 127 (1948) . . . . The Board has an obligation to insure that an election is held "under such conditions as well be conducive to the sort of free and untrammeled choice of representatives contemplated by the Act." Methodist Home v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 1173, 1183 (4th Cir. 1979) . . . .

> Hence, extreme care must be taken that the laboratory conditions have not become so tainted that employees may have based their vote not upon conviction, but upon fear or upon any other improperly induced consideration. The Board and the courts have emphasized that the existence of a coercive atmosphere, regardless of how such an atmosphere came about, is the critical fact upon which the Board should focus in determining whether a fair and free election was impossible. Diamond State Poultry Co., 107 NLRB 3, 6 (1953); Cross Baking

[153] See NLRB v. Charles Batchelder Co., 646 F.2d 33, 40 (2d Cir. 1981). The court of appeals stated therein,

> Before an undisputed threat of violence to an employee can be written off as pretextual with the consequent impact of depriving the employer of his right of management, more evidence than is before us now must be presented.

Additionally, the General Counsel argues that "a significant factor in determining that alleged threats are a pretext to justify an otherwise discriminatory discharge, is the failure of management to confront the accused with the facts and to afford him an opportunity to explain or deny the accusations," citing Elk Brand Mfg. Co., 253 NLRB 1038 (1981), and other cases. The General Counsel continues, "Moreover the inference to be drawn is also supported in the present case by the fact that, although Respondent raised the argument that Picazzo had intimidated other employees as a defense in Picazzo's unemployment compensation hearing, Respondent also did not identify in that proceeding whom Picazzo supposedly threatened," citing PPG Industries, 251 NLRB 1146 (1980). While I have already discussed this previously, I further find that the circumstances present in the above cited cases differ significantly from the instant case, i.e., in the PPG Industries case, the employer offered conflicting reasons for the discharge. Also see NLRB v. Charles Batchelder Co., supra at 40.

[154] See Classe Ribbon Co., supra; Standard Motor Products, 265 NLRB 482 (1982). Contrast: St. Mary's Infant Home, 258 NLRB 1024 (1981).

[155] The Respondent challenged the ballot of Ralph Picazzo on the alleged ground that he was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act and thereby ineligible to vote in the election.

[156] The Regional Director for Region 21 therefore consolidated Cases 21–CA–20824 and 21–RC–16865 for purposes of hearing.

> Co. v. NLRB, 453 F.2d 1346, 1348 (1st Cir. 1971).[157]

Moreover, in those cases in which election conduct is found to have inhibited the employees' free choice in selecting their bargaining representatives, it is the duty of the Board to withhold certification and order a new election.[158]

The Respondent contends in its brief that Picazzo's "threats and intimidating conduct" resulted in the election being held in an atmosphere of fear and reprisal which was not conducive to a rational, uncoerced choice of a bargaining representative and, therefore, the election results should be "invalidated" and the election set aside. The Respondent continues therein that because Picazzo was a supervisor who participated in the Union's organizational campaign, and made threats to employees of adverse treatment unless they supported the Union, the election was "tainted by such supervisory pressure [and] cannot be upheld."[159] In the alternative, the Respondent in its brief asserts that, "Even if it is somehow found that Picazzo was not a supervisor, it is clear that his conduct was of a sufficient magnitude to warrant overturning the election."

As previously found herein, Picazzo was not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and I therefore reject the Respondent's contention that the election should be set aside because of his participation in the Union's organizational campaign. In view thereof, I conclude that the Respondent's Objection 9, founded primarily upon Picazzo's alleged supervisory status, should be overruled. Moreover, although the Respondent uses the term "Supervisor Picazzo" in its Objections 3, 5, 7, and 8 and notwithstanding my having found Picazzo not to be a supervisor, the issue of whether the election should be invalidated and set aside because of Picazzo's conduct remains to be determined.

In Zeiglers Refuse Collectors v. NLRB, supra at 1005, the court of appeals continues,

> In determining whether a fair and free choice by the employees was impossible the Board must consider many factors. These include: the number of the threats, the severity of the threats and whether those threatened were put in fear, the number of workers threatened, whether the threats were made close to the election and whether they persisted in the minds of the employees at the time of the election, whether the reports of the threats were widely circulated, whether the effect of pro-union threats were cancelled out by pro-management threats, the closeness of the vote, Monmouth Medical Center v. NLRB, 604 F.2d 820, 823 n. 4 (3d Cir. 1979), and whether the threats can be attributed to the union or the management, see e.g., Price Bros. Co., 211 NLRB 822, 823 (1974). See also Campbell Prods. Dept., 623 F.2d 876 (3d Cir. 1980). The Board must examine the record, determine the weight to be accorded each factor, and applying its experience, arrive at a final, articulated decision supported by substantial evidence.

Moreover, in NLRB v. Aaron Bros. Corp., 563 F.2d 409, 412 (9th Cir. 1977), the court of appeals held,

> The Board will not set an election aside unless misconduct "constitute[d] an interference with free choice, for or against a bargaining representative . . . ." N.L.R.B. v. Bata Shoe Co., 377 F.2d 821 (4th Cir.), cert. denied 389 U.S. 917 (1967), quoting Anchor Mfg. Co. v. N.L.R.B. [300 F.2d 303 (5th Cir. 1962)] . . . . We adhere to the Board's policy that "activities of a union's employee adherents which are not attributable to the union itself are entitled to less weight in the variable equation which leads to a conclusion that an election must be set aside." N.L.R.B. v. Monroe Auto Equipment Co., 470 F.2d 1329 (5th Cir. 1972). Furthermore this Court has recognized that the Board's policy "credits employees with the ability to give true weight to the possibly impulsive allegations of fellow employees induced by the heat of a campaign." NL.R.B. v. Sauk Valley Mfg. Co., Inc., 486 F.2d 1127, 1131, n. 5 (9th Cir. 1973). So to warrant overturning an election, employee conduct must be "coercive and disruptive conduct or other action [which] is so aggravated that a free expression of choice of representation is impossible." [Emphasis added.][160]

It is well settled that an election will be set aside where there is an atmosphere of violence or threats of violence which precludes employees from exercising a free choice.[161] For conduct to warrant setting aside an election, not only must that conduct be coercive, but it must be so related to the election as to have had a probable effect upon the employees' actions at the polls.[162] The burden of proving that an election should be invalidated because of objectionable conduct rests with the party filing the objections, in this case, the Respondent.[163] The Respondent, as the party challenging pre-lection conduct, must establish that such conduct impaired employees' freedom of choice.[164] Thus, when preelection conduct is challenged on the basis that it interfered with the election, the critical inquiry is whether employees were able to exercise free choice.[165]

Initially, it should be noted that, without some evidence that the Union "instigated, directed, authorized, adopted, ratified or condoned" Picazzo's statements threatening employees, those statements may not be attributed to the Union.[166] I can find no such evidence in this proceeding. Picazzo held no position in or conferred by the Union.[167] Nor does the record reveal any impropriety committed by a union official. Further, there is no showing that the Union knew of Picazzo's improper acts or that it failed to repudiate them.[168] Therefore, Picazzo's threats to other employees cannot be attributed to the Union and must be considered as being those of a third party.

It has long been held that the acts of third parties, including those of rank-and-file employees, even if the employees are "outspoken union partisans" are given less weight in determining whether or not conduct actually or potentially would affect the freedom of choice of employees.[169] However, both the Board and the courts have held that where the conduct creates a general atmosphere of fear and reprisal which renders a free expression of choice of representative impossible, thereby destroying the laboratory conditions of the election, the election will be set aside, despite the fact that such conduct is not attributable to either party to the election.[170]

In applying the above Board and court decisions to the circumstances present in this case, and while not condoning misconduct of the type found herein,[171] I conclude that such conduct was insufficient to warrant the setting aside of the election. Although Picazzo's various statements to employees, made both before and after the election, were found to constitute threats of an egregious and intemperate nature and sufficient to justify his discharge lawfully, regarding this particular issue we are concerned with his preelection conduct, and I find the character thereof is not so aggravated as to create an atmosphere of fear and reprisal which so rendered a free expression of choice of representative impossible and thus destroyed the laboratory conditions of the election.

It should be noted that Picazzo's misconduct occurred between 2 weeks and "two or three" days before the election. As stated by the Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, in Methodist Home v. NLRB, supra at 1184:

> If coercive conduct takes place on the very day of the election, particularly if within an hour or two before the election is to take place, it can be assumed to have had a far more substantial effect on the election than conduct occurring days or weeks before the election, since in the latter case the effect of the conduct may have largely been dissipated before election day.

The evidence shows that Picazzo warned Mark Freeland and Larry Colvard that their "brother" Jerry Colvard would be discharged by the Respondent and "be gone" after the Union won the election. As discussed above, these employees interpreted this as, in effect, meaning that the Union would insist on Jerry Colvard's dismissal because of his known strong antiunion feelings and that the Respondent would be compelled to comply therewith. Picazzo also warned Freeland that "it would be rough for you" if he failed to support the Union. Freeland and Colvard both testified that Picazzo's statements caused them to fear for their job security. However, neither employee testified that this had altered their decision as to which way they intended to vote in the election.[172] Moreover, it should be remembered that when they apprised Moore of their fears he assured them that the discharge of employees was still subject to management decision whatever the Union's input and that they had nothing to worry about, that their jobs were secure. The impact of this assurance, coming soon after Picazzo's threats and a few days before the election, could well have dissipated any coercive effects of Picazzo's threats concerning these employees.[173] heavy burden in charging that coercion prevented a fair election, for evidence must be furnished overcoming the presumption that ballots cast under the the safeguards provided by Board procedure reflect the true desires of the participating employees.

[164] NLRB v. Eurodrive, Inc., 724 F.2d 556 (6th Cir. 1984); NLRB v. Basic Wire Products, 516 F.2d 261 (6th Cir. 1975).

[167] The fact that Picazzo was designated by the Union as an election observer does not alter this finding. In accordance with well-settled Board law, Picazzo's service as an election observer did not confer upon him the status of a union agent. Moreover, there is no evidence in the record that Picazzo received any payment for this service. (That Picazzo acknowledged being "paid off" by the Union for his union activities, whether made seriously or jokingly, is too ambiguous in the record to be considered evidence thereof.) Anchor Inn Hotel of St. Croix, 262 NLRB 1137 (1982); Connecticut Foundry Co., 247 NLRB 1514 (1980); Methodist Home v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 1173 (4th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Bristol Spring Mfg. Co., 579 F.2d 704 (2d Cir. 1978). Additionally, the Union also designated Jerry Colvard, a known antiunion employee, as its other election observer. Further, while Picazzo did actually campaign on the Union's behalf, by speaking to employees in its favor, he never obtained employee signatures on union authorization cards other than his own, and had not been instrumental in bringing the Union into the Respondent's plant to organize the employees. Moreover, the Union in no other way, actually or impliedly, held Picazzo out as its representative with the employees. Contrast, NLRB v. Georgetown Dress Corp., 537 F.2d 1239 (4th Cir. 1976), wherein it was held that members of a union's "in-plant organizing committee" were agents of the union regarding their union activities.

[172] Contrast, Steak House Meat Co., 206 NLRB 28 (1973).

[173] It should be noted that Jerry and Larry Colvard and Mark Freeland were known to be against union representation, and the tenor of the evidence herein including the testimony given strongly infers, and it can be reasonably presumed, that they voted against the Union in the election

Additionally, in connection with Picazzo's threats involving Jerry Colvard, the Board, in a somewhat analogous situation, confirmed the ruling of the administrative law judge in Anchor Inn Hotel of St. Croix, 262 NLRB 1137 (1982), that statements made by an employee, similar in nature to Picazzo's regarding Jerry Colvard and which lent themselves to the same reasonable interpretation of meaning as in the instant case, did not interfere with a free election, and upheld his recommendation to overrule the election objection premised thereon.[174]

Picazzo also threatened to "kill" employee Brent Yankee if he disclosed to anyone what Picazzo had told him during their conversation about the Union. Picazzo had previously been admonished by Moore to cease his union activities or face discharge. That Picazzo did not want the Respondent to know that he was continuing this activity is strongly suggested by the evidence herein.[175] Thus it is apparent that his threat to Yankee was directed toward this end rather than towards coercing Yankee into voting for the Union. While obviously Picazzo would have liked Yankee to support the Union by voting for it in the upcoming election, he did not threaten Yankee to do so. Moreover, as Yankee testified, this encounter with Picazzo actually strengthened his resolve to vote against the Union. It is therefore evident that Yankee did not act in fear of reprisal when he cast his ballot.[176]

Additionally, while there is testimony in the record that rumors were circulating at the Respondent's plant that Larry Colvard, Freeland, and Yankee had been threatened, Picazzo's name was not associated with the threats nor was the subject matter thereof identified in the record. The Respondent has the burden of proof on this issue and evidence concerning the circulation of rumors of ambiguous threats is not sufficient to establish that an election was conducted in a general atmosphere of fear of reprisal. Moreover, the Union won the election by a vote of 19 to 10. Picazzo was found not to be a supervisor so that his challenged ballot should be counted and a good bet would be that he voted for the Union. Thus the Union won by a 2-to-1 margin, not insubstantial or that close, even though the total vote was not large, 30 eligible voters. As the United States Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit stated in Methodist Home v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 1173, 1184:

> [T]he result of the election itself, whether won by a clear majority or by a close vote, is entitled to considerable weight in evaluating the influence of the challenged conduct on the fairness of the election. It has been repeatedly declared that in a case where "a change of only a few votes would affect the outcome of the election, less egregious actions may require a rerun of the election than [in] a case in which a clear-cut choice has emerged from the balloting." N.L.R.B. v. Gulf State Canners, Inc., (5th Cir. 1978) 585 F.2d 757, 759; Henderson Trumbull Supply Corp. v. N.L.R.B. (2d Cir. 1974) 501 F.2d 1224, 1230.

The Board in ATR Wire & Cable Co., 267 NLRB 204, 210 (1983), affirmed the conclusions of the administrative law judge that:

> The policy of the Act is to further collective bargaining if a majority of employees in an appropriate unit so choose. The question here is whether the wishes of a majority of the Respondent's employees to bargain collectively should be set aside because of the actions of a few individuals. Should the validity of an election depend upon the subjective feelings of a few antiunion employees, even if those subjective feelings were real as to them? I conclude that the overwhelming case authority is to the contrary. Absent actual acts which would reasonably intimidate or coerce employees in the exercise of their votes, the wishes of a majority of employees should not be lightly set aside.

Accordingly, I find and conclude that Picazzo's preelection threats directed to Mark Freeland, Larry Colvard, and Brent Yankee, while not to be condoned, were insufficient to warrant the setting aside of the election. I additionally recommend, in light of the foregoing, that the Respondent's Objections 3, 5, 7, 8, and 9 be overruled.

V. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, found to constitute unfair labor practices occurring in connection with the operations of the Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

VI. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

In light of the standards set forth in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), I conclude that a broad remedial order is inappropriate since it has not been shown that the Respondent has a proclivity to violate the Act or has despite Picazzo's threats. After the Union had won the election, Freeland asked Picazzo what Freeland could do to get on the Union's "good side." Also he did not tell Picazzo that he had voted for the Union to support his request to ingratiate himself with Picazzo and the Union, which he most likely would have done if in fact he had voted for the Union.

[174] As set forth above, Picazzo's statements concerning Jerry Colvard's discharge attain reasonable meaning only in the light of future pressure by the Union which won the election, to get rid of an ardent antiunion employee and in the context of a collective-bargaining agreement containing a union-security clause.

[175] While not coupled with a threat as in the Yankee incident, Picazzo also asked Freeland and Larry Colvard not to tell management about Picazzo's conversation with them concerning the Union.

[176] I am aware that Yankee suffered damage to his automobile (a broken window) soon after his conversation with Picazzo. While property damage is of course a serious matter, this was the only instance of such damage done to employee property appearing in the record and neither Picazzo nor the Union was connected to its accomplishment. I do not find this sufficient to change my finding concerning the threat to Yankee. See ATR Wire & Cable Co., supra.

engaged in such egregious or widespread misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for employees' fundamental rights. Accordingly, I recommend the use of the narrow injunctive language "in any like or related manner" in the recommended Order.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Chicago Metallic Corporation, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union 170, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By threatening an employee with discharge if he failed to discontinue campaigning for the Union and/or campaigning for the Union on company time, the Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employee in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act, and has thereby engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The Respondent did not engage in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act when it discharged Ralph Picazzo.

5. The unfair labor practices engaged in by the Respondent as set forth in Conclusion of Law 3, above, affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Objections in Case 21-RC-16865

It having been established herein that the acts relied on by the Respondent did not in fact have such a coercive effect as to warrant the setting aside of the election held on November 5, 1981, nor interfere with the employees' free choice therein, I recommend that the Respondent's Objections 3, 5, 7, 8, and 9 be overruled. Since the Union received a clear majority of the valid ballots cast in the election, I recommend that the Board certify the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the unit found appropriate therein.[177]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[178]

ORDER

The Respondent, Chicago Metallic Corporation, Vernon, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening its employees with discharge if they engage in activities on behalf of the Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union 170, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its facility located at 5501 Downey Road, Vernon, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[179] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the allegations of unlawful conduct not specifically found herein to be violative of the Act be dismissed.

IT IS ALSO ORDERED that, in Case 21-RC-16865, Objections 3, 5, 7, 8, and 9 be overruled, the election held on November 5, 1981, be validated, and the Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union 170, AFL-CIO be certified as the exclusive representative of all the employees in the appropriate unit for purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union

[177] The appropriate unit consists of "all production and maintenance employees and shipping and receiving employees, including leadpersons, employed by [the Respondent] at its facility located at 5501 Downey Road, Vernon, California, excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, managerial employees, confidential employees, professional employees, and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act."

I am not unmindful that some time has elapsed since that date of the election on November 5, 1981, until today and that the courts have asserted that the Board should consider employee turnover over the passage of time in connection with representation and bargaining issues. However, there is no evidence in the record that the Respondent experienced any employee turnover problem. Moreover, had the Union been certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit after the election, the employees would not be in any different circumstances, and should employee desires change as to representation, the Board offers procedures for accomplishing this.

[178] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[179] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with discharge if they join, support, or otherwise engage in activities on behalf of the Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union 170, AFL–CIO or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

CHICAGO METALLIC CORPORATION

Blue Island Newspaper Printing, Inc. and Chicago Typographical Union No. 16, Petitioner. Case 13-RC-16459

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

The National Labor Relations Board has considered objections to an election held 28 June 1984 and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows 20 for and 10 against the Petitioner, with no challenged ballots. The Employer, Blue Island Newspaper Printing, Inc. (Blue Island), filed objections to the election, and the Regional Director directed that a hearing be held before a hearing officer.

The Board has reviewed the record[1] in light of the exceptions and briefs and adopts the hearing officer's findings and recommendations[2] as modified and finds that a certification of representative should be issued.

The hearing officer recommended that all six of Blue Island's objections to the election be overruled. Blue Island excepts as to the hearing officer's disposition of Objections 3, 4, 5, and 6. We find no merit in Blue Island's exceptions but modify and supplement the hearing officer's report as follows.

I.

Objection 3 concerned, in part, two statements made by third-shift press employee John Hill that allegedly created an atmosphere of fear which interfered with a free and fair election. About 1-1/2 weeks before the election, after Blue Island's president made an antiunion speech at an employee meeting, third-shift pressman John Kwiatkowski heard Hill say, "I am going to have my own meeting and take care of those who are going to vote no." On the morning of the election prior to the polls opening, third-shift Press Foreman David Bujnowski[3] heard Hill, while in the press area, say, "I will have to take care of all your no votes." Hill denied that he made these statements, but the hearing officer found to the contrary.

To judge whether threats by third parties[4] create a general atmosphere of fear and reprisal that renders a free election impossible, we apply the following criteria recently articulated in Westwood Horizons Hotel, 270 NLRB 802 (1984):

> In determining the seriousness of a threat, the Board evaluates not only the nature of the threat itself, but also whether the threat encompassed the entire bargaining unit; whether reports of the threat were disseminated widely within the unit; whether the person making the threat was capable of carrying it out, and whether it is likely that the employees acted in fear of his capability of carrying out the threat; and whether the threat was "rejuvenated" at or near the time of the election.

Id. at 803 (footnotes omitted). In this case, in addition to Foreman Bujnowski, six employees worked in the press area during the third shift: Hill, Kwiatkowski, Alonzo Dixon, Joseph Davis, Michael Bocot, and David Lancaster. As Hill's threatening statements were made in the press area, they appear to have been directed to, at most, the other third-shift press employees. As Kwiatkowski was an outspoken opponent of the Union, it may have been that Hill's statements were directed solely or principally at Kwiatkowski. Dixon, Davis, and Bocot testified that they did not hear the statement Hill made 1-1/2 weeks before the election that he would hold his own meeting and take care of those who were going to vote no, nor did they hear Hill's statement on the morning of the election that he would take care of the no votes. Moreover, they testified that they had not heard about such statements being made. Lancaster did not testify. Kwiatkowski, who heard Hill's earlier statement, testified that another employee was standing in the vicinity when this statement was made, but he could not recall which employee it was. Kwiatkowski told only his foreman, Bujnowski, about Hill's statement. Kwiatkowski also testified about a conversation he had with Hill on the morning of the election but did not testify that he had heard Hill's statement that morning that he was going to take care of the no votes. Therefore, we conclude that Hill's threatening statements were heard by only one foreman and, at most, two employees—Kwiatkowski and the unidentified employee who was in the vicinity when Hill made his first statement.[5] We further conclude that the testimony of

[1] We grant Blue Island's request that the word "paystubs" be corrected to read "paste-ups" everywhere that it appears in the hearing transcripts.

[2] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt, pro forma, the hearing officer's recommendations that Objections 1 and 2 be overruled.

[3] Notwithstanding Bujnowski's job title, his name, as well as that of another press foreman, appeared on the Excelsior list.

[4] We adopt the hearing officer's conclusion, for the reasons he states, that Hill was not an agent of the Union.

[5] It may be that Lancaster was the unidentified employee, as he was the only third-shift press employee who did not testify. All the others, except Kwiatkowski, denied hearing Hill's statement. Alternatively, it may be that the unidentified employee did not hear Hill's statement.

the other employees that they did not hear Hill's statements and had no knowledge of them affirmatively demonstrates that knowledge of Hill's statements was not disseminated to the other employees.

As to whether Hill was capable of harming opponents of the Union and whether it is likely that the employees acted in fear of his carrying out the threats, there was evidence that Hill at one time had a fight with his brother, who also was an employee of Blue Island, outside of work concerning a nonwork-related matter, but Hill had not been in fights at work. Additionally, a long time ago Hill had been a high school wrestler in the 105 pound weight class. The hearing officer found that Hill had a serious, almost brooding, demeanor. Davis and Bocot both testified that Hill was a quiet person. Kwiatkowski testified that Hill was mild mannered but tried to cultivate a reputation of being tough, although Kwiatkowski did not specify what Hill did to try to develop this reputation. Kwiatkowski also testified that, after he heard Hill say that Hill was going to have his own meeting and take care of those who were going to vote no, Kwiatkowski did not take seriously that Hill might do something to opponents of the Union. We also note that the language of Hill's two statements was vague and susceptible to a variety of interpretations. On the basis of these facts, we conclude that the hearing officer was correct in finding that Hill was not especially capable of carrying out a threat of physical harm. Moreover, we conclude that it is not likely that the employees acted in fear of Hill's threatening statements.

Finally, as to rejuvenation of the threat, Hill repeated his statement on the morning of the election but, as discussed above, Foreman Bujnowski was the only person to hear or learn of this statement.

Based on our analysis of Hill's threatening statements and the circumstances in which they were made, under the criteria set forth in Westwood Horizons Hotel, above, we conclude that, at most, only three individuals had knowledge of Hill's statements and the statements were unlikely to intimidate prospective voters. Therefore, we agree with the hearing officer that Hill's statements did not create a general atmosphere of fear and reprisal rendering a free election impossible.

II.

We adopt the hearing officer's finding, in overruling Objection 6, that Marilyn Setzke,[6] the most prominent union supporter among the employees, was not a supervisor. Moreover, even if she performed the functions of a supervisor on the occasions that both Josie Kwiatkowski, who was in charge of stuffers, and Scott McManimen, who was the senior stuffer, were absent, these occasions were sporadic and insignificant. Setzke substituted for Kwiatkowski and McManimen only six times between 1 January and 30 July 1984, including three times from 1 January 1984 to the date the election petition was filed, 7 May 1984, and three times from 7 May to 30 July 1984.[7] The substitutions occurred irregularly rather than on any scheduled basis. Therefore, even if Setzke performed as a supervisor on the few occasions that she substituted for Kwiatkowski and McManimen, she did not spend a regular and substantial portion of her working time performing supervisory tasks. Accordingly, under Aladdin Hotel, 270 NLRB 838 (1984), she was not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11)[8] of the National Labor Relations Act.

In adopting the hearing officer's disposition of Objection 6, we find it unnecessary to pass on the alternative rationales set forth by the hearing officer supporting his disposition beyond his finding that Setzke was not a supervisor.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Chicago Typographical Union No. 16 and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and part-time production and maintenance employees but excluding all office clerical employees, salesmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[6] The spelling of the name "Setzke" is corrected from that which appears in the hearing officer's report.

[7] Although whether Setzke was a supervisor after 28 June 1984, the date of the election, has no relevance to Objection 6, the evidence was presented in terms of the number of times that Setzke acted as a substitute prior to 30 July 1984, the final day of the hearing. Of the three times that Setzke served as a substitute between 7 May and 30 July 1984, the record shows that one of these occasions was on 27 May. It is not clear whether the two other times were before or after 28 June. Even if we assume that all three were prior to the election, our conclusion that Setzke did not fill in for Kwiatkowski often enough or regularly enough to be deemed a supervisor is not altered.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 10 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge Stanley N. Ohlbaum issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a reply brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Dane County Dairy, Inc., Madison, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

STANLEY N. OHLBAUM, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding[1] under the National Labor Relations Act (Act) was litigated before me in Madison, Wisconsin, on January 5, 1984, with all parties participating throughout by counsel or other representative. Respondent elected to proceed through its secretary and registered agent Duane F. Bowman. Although the Charging Party was present and testified through its recording secretary and business agent Louis Firari, it was unrepresented by its own counsel at the trial. All parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard and to present evidence and contentions. Although at the conclusion of the trial Respondent requested and was allowed 1 month's time to file briefs and propose findings and conclusions, none have been received. The entire record has been carefully considered.

Issues

The issues presented are whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act through failing and refusing to furnish the Charging Party with required bargaining information and, through instituting unilaterally during the course of collective negotiations with the Union, unnegotiated changes in wages, terms, and conditions of employment of Respondent's bargaining unit employees.

On the entire record and may observations of the testimonial demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

At all material times, Respondent, a Wisconsin corporation, has been engaged in the wholesale dairying and/or carrier delivery service of dairy and other products, based in Madison, Wisconsin. During the representative calendar year immediately preceding issuance of the complaint, Respondent purchased and received at or

[1] In its exceptions the Respondent contends that the complaint should be dismissed because it does not meet the Board's jurisdictional standards. We find no merit in this contention. Thus, in Dane County Dairy, 269 NLRB 218 (1984), the Board asserted jurisdiction over the Respondent based on the finding of the judge there, to which the Respondent did not except, that it met the Board's $50,000 indirect inflow standard for nonretail commercial enterprises and the Respondent's admission that it was an employer within the meaning of the Act. In the present case, the complaint alleges that the Respondent met the Board's indirect inflow standard by purchasing and receiving within the previous year products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from enterprises within the State which had received them directly from points located outside the State. The Respondent neither denied this allegation of the complaint in its answer nor presented any evidence at the hearing to refute it. At the hearing, the Respondent admitted facts sufficient to show that it meets the statutory standard for assertion of the Board's jurisdiction and admitted that it was an employer within the meaning of the Act. Although evidence was presented at the hearing to show that around July 1983 (within a year prior to the issuance of the complaint) the Respondent converted its operations as a licensed wholesale dairy to a wholesale line hauler, there is no evidence that after this change the Respondent no longer continued to meet the Board's indirect inflow standard for the assertion of jurisdiction. In these circumstances, we find it proper to assert jurisdiction over the Respondent. See Roma Baking Co., 263 NLRB 24 fn. 1 (1982). In asserting jurisdiction over the Respondent, however, we do not adopt the judge's finding that at the hearing the Respondent admitted purchasing goods in the State valued at $50,000 which its suppliers had acquired from places outside the State, since the record reflects no such specific admission by the Respondent at the hearing.

[2] In the remedy portion of his decision, the judge concluded that the Respondent should be required to pay interest in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), inter alia, on sums it failed to contribute to the employees' pension and health and welfare plans as a result of its unilateral discontinuance of payments to those plans. Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of a proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. Accordingly, we do not adopt the portion of the judge's proposed remedy providing for Florida Steel interest rates on delinquent fund contributions. Rather, we leave to the compliance stage the question whether the Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the fringe benefit funds in order to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending on the circumstances of the case, by reference to the provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful withholding action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979). Further, with respect to all backpay due here, the judge cited F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950). We note that the quarterly computation method used in F. W. Woolworth is inappropriate in the circumstances here. See Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970).

[1] Based on a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 30 of the National Labor Relations Board, dated October 25, growing out of a charge filed September 9, 1983.

near its Madison, Wisconsin facility products, goods, and materials valued at over $50,000 in connection with and as a necessary part and in the course and conduct of the operation of its aforesaid business enterprise from other enterprises in Wisconsin in turn acquired from places outside of Wisconsin. At trial, Respondent conceded such purchases and stipulated it is an employer within the meaning of the Act.[2]

I find that at all material times Respondent has been and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act; and that, at all of those times, the Charging Party has been and is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

At trial, Respondent conceded in testimony of its secretary, registered agent and labor negotiator Duane F. Bowman, that during the course of negotiations with the Charging Party as acknowledged bargaining representative of Respondent's bargaining unit employees and, without having arrived at impasse, Respondent unilaterally (1) reduced unit employees' wages from $8.84 to $8 per hour, and (2) ceased making contributions to those employees' health and welfare and pension funds. It was further established, through credited testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses,[3] not overcome by credible counterproof, that Respondent also unilaterally (3) discontinued its long-established system of vacation pay,[4] and also (4) failed and refused to provide the Union with bargaining information, needed and expressly requested by the Union, as well as explicitly promised to the Union by Respondent, concerning (a) costs of Respondent's sick leave, jury-duty leave, and funeral leave policies and practices for its employees, and (b) data, with confirmatory audit access to Respondent's books and records, concerning Respondent's plea of poverty, acknowledged by Respondent at trial to have been made. Although Respondent denies it has also failed and refused to agree to a date for further negotiations, I credit Bowman's testimony that he is ready and willing to continue to negotiate, since no negotiating impasse has been reached, but that he has, as a matter of strongly felt individual principle, been unwilling to negotiate under the compulsion, "threat," or "club" of the instant pending unfair labor practices proceeding against Respondent. It is clear, however, that, as matter of law, this is no defense, since the filing of a charge under the Act neither mitigates prior unlawful failure to bargain or other violation of the Act nor tolls further obligation to bargain and otherwise comply with the Act's requirements. Cf. Pine Manor Nursing Home, 230 NLRB 320, 326 (1977), enfd. 578 F.2d 575 (5th Cir. 1978); Zenith Radio Corp., 187 NLRB 785 (1971), enfd. 80 LRRM 2768 (7th Cir. 1972). Under our system, where individual "principle" clashes with law, it must yield to law, recourse being to the legislative branch.

Respondent also contends that because of the necessity to "defend" this proceeding it has not had the time to furnish the required bargaining information, which it does not contend is improper and which, indeed, it has agreed to supply to the Union. Since this "explanation," which is difficult to accept and has not been factually established, would in any event not be a defense to those allegations of the complaint[5] and has no bearing whatsoever on the allegations concerning the unilateral changes in wages, terms and conditions of employment during the course of impasse-free bargaining, the "explanation" is noted but must be rejected as inadequate in law.

That unilateral changes in wages and terms and conditions of employment during impasse-free collective bargaining are violative of the bargaining obligation of the Act has long been well settled. See Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1964); NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 203 (1964); Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475 (1967), enfd. 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968). It has likewise been long settled that failure to provide necessary bargaining information or data, reasonably required by the employees' bargaining representative in fulfilment of its bargaining tasks—including access to the employer's books and records to confirm an employer's claim of poverty or economic inability to deal further[6]—is also violative of the bargaining obligations of the Act. See NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956); Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61 (3d Cir. 1965); NLRB v. Whitin Machine Works, 217 F.2d 593, 594 (4th Cir. 1954), cert. denied 349 U.S. 905 (1955). That this includes fringe benefit cost data, see NLRB v. Borden, 600 F.2d 313 (1st Cir. 1979); Sylvania Electric Products v. NLRB, 358 F.2d 591 (1st Cir. 1966), cert. denied 385 U.S. 852 (1966); Curtiss-Wright, supra; NLRB v. John S. Swift Co., 277 F.2d 641 (7th Cir. 1960); Semco Printing Center, 265 NLRB No. 73 (1982) (not reported in Board volumes); Weber Veneer & Plywood Co., 161 NLRB 1054 (1966). It is, finally, further well settled that, since such actions also interfere with, restrain, and coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed to them by the Act, they also infringe employees' Section 7 rights and thereby violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

It is accordingly so found and determined.

On the foregoing findings and the entire record, I state the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Jurisdiction is properly asserted in this proceeding.

2. By its actions described and found in section II, above by each of them, Respondent has, as alleged in the complaint, failed and refused, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act to bargain in good faith with the Charging Party as the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit:

> All production and maintenance employees, including driver salesmen, milk and ice cream, relief drivers, truckdrivers, working foremen and garage employees at Respondent's facility in Madison, Wisconsin.

3. By its said actions and each of them, Respondent has further interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees, and continues so to do, in the exercise of their rights under Section 7, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of said Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices and each of them have affected, are affecting and, unless permanently restrained and enjoined, will continue to affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Respondent should be required to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found, and affirmatively to carry out its bargaining obligations under the Act. Respondent should further, under the circumstances, be required to reinstate all unilaterally changed wages and to make and reinstitute all unilaterally discontinued benefits and other payments, pending the outcome of good-faith bargaining thereon with its unit employees' bargaining representative; also forthwith to furnish said representative with necessary and required bargaining information and data consisting of costs of its sick leave, jury-duty leave, and funeral leave policies and practices; and also to furnish said representative with economic data, with access to Respondent's books and records for corroboration and audit purposes, to support Respondent's claim of poverty and economic inability to deal further. Sums due to employees and the Union shall be computed, together with interest, as explicated in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). Respondent should also be required to preserve and make available to the Board's agents its books and records for backpay, other computation, and compliance purposes and, finally, to post the usual informative notice to employees.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 6 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Frank H. Itkin issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed her brief to the judge in support of the decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge concluded that the Respondent violated the Act by suspending and threatening to discharge employee Herbert King because he refused to cross a stranger picket line to perform assigned work at the premises of the Respondent's customer. We reverse.

On 17 August 1983 the Respondent assigned King to read a meter and change a tape at Indiana Bell Telephone Company. Bell employees were picketing the premises when King arrived, and he refused to cross the picket line. The Respondent suspended him for 2-1/2 days and warned that refusal to cross a picket line to carry out a job assignment was cause for immediate termination.

The Respondent claimed, inter alia, that its actions did not violate the Act because the following contractual provision waived employees' right to engage in sympathy strikes:

> [T]he Union and each employee covered by the agreement agree not to cause, encourage, permit, or take part in any strike, picketing, sit-down, stay-in, slow-down, or other curtailment of work or interference with the operation of the Company's business, and the Company agrees not to engage in a lock-out.

Following Board precedent,[1] the judge reasoned that, because the contractual no-strike language did not expressly mention sympathy strikes, the contract would not bar them unless extrinsic evidence clearly showed the parties' intent to do so. He found the parties' bargaining history and past practice regarding sympathy strikes equivocal and uncertain, and thus insufficient to establish a sympathy-strike waiver.

We conclude that the broad no-strike clause bars employees from honoring stranger picket lines. We agree with former Member Penello, concurring in Operating Engineers Local 18 (Davis-McKee), 238 NLRB 652, 661 (1978), that a broad no-strike prohibition encompasses direct and indirect work stoppages, including sympathy strikes: "Where the parties to a collective-bargaining contract embody in the agreement a clause stating essentially that there shall be no strikes during the term of the agreement, it means that there shall be no strikes during the terms of the agreement—unless extrinsic evidence indicates that the parties intended otherwise." Although previous Board decisions have held that sympathy strikes lie outside the scope of broad no-strike clauses, we can discern no logical or practical basis for the proposition that the prohibition of all "strikes" does not include sympathy strikes merely because the word "sympathy" is not used. As the District of Columbia Circuit stated, "[T]he practical relationship between work stoppages and the honoring of picket lines is so well understood in the industrial climate that we think that a clause of this kind using only the word 'strike' includes plant suspensions resulting from refusals to report for work across picket lines." News Union of Baltimore v. NLRB, 393 F.2d 673, 676–677 (1968). See also the Seventh Circuit's opinion in United States Steel, supra.

We consider former Member Penello's Davis-McKee concurrence a sound and straightforward guide to construing no-strike provisions. If a collective-bargaining agreement prohibits strikes, we shall read the prohibition plainly and literally as prohibiting all strikes, including sympathy strikes. If, however, the contract or extrinsic evidence demonstrates that the parties intended to exempt sympathy strikes, we shall give the parties' intent controlling weight. We therefore overrule such cases as United States Steel and W-I Canteen Service to the extent that the standard applied there is inconsistent with this holding.

The instant no-strike provision prohibits "strike[s], picketing . . . or other curtailment of work." Nothing in it suggests an intent to create an exception for sympathy strikes. Further, based on the judge's discussion of the bargaining history and the parties' conduct, we find there is insufficient extrinsic evidence establishing the parties' intent to exclude sympathy strikes from the no-strike provision's scope.

We therefore conclude that the no-strike provision "clearly and unmistakably" waived the employees' right to engage in sympathy strikes. See Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 693 (1983). Accordingly, employee King was not privileged to refuse to cross the picket line established at the premises of the Respondent's customer, and the Respondent was therefore free to suspend King and threaten him with discharge for refusing to cross the picket line.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

FRANK H. ITKIN, Administrative Law Judge. An unfair labor practice charge was filed in this case on August 18 and a complaint was issued on September 29, 1983. A hearing was held in Indianapolis, Indiana, on November 28 and 29, 1983. The General Counsel alleges that Respondent Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by disciplining and threatening employee Herbert King with discharge because of his refusal to cross a picket line and perform his assigned job duties at the premises of Respondent's customers. The principal question raised here is whether or not the Charging Party Union waived in its collective-bargaining agreement the statutory right of its employee members, including King, to engage in sympathy strikes. On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent Company, a public utility engaged in the sale of electrical engergy, is an employer engaged in commerce as alleged. The Charging Party Union is a labor organization as alleged.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

The Company and the Union have been parties to collective-bargaining contracts covering an appropriate unit of employees, including Herbert King, since 1972. The pertinent provisions of the initial 1972 contract, which have remained unchanged and are presently operative, are as follows (G.C. Exh. 2):

ARTICLE 1

Section 1.02. Recognition of the Rights of the Company. The Company has and retains the right to manage and direct its business, property and employees according to the best judgment of its officers and duly authorized supervisors, subject only to the limitations expressed in the terms of this agreement and the rights of employees to the adjustment of their grievances as herein provided.

Section 1.03 Recognition of the Agreement. During the term of this agreement and any extension or renewal thereof, the Union and each employee covered by the agreement agree not to cause, encourage, permit, or take part in any strike, picketing, sitdown, stay-in, slow-down, or other curtailment of work or interference with the operation of the Company's business, and the Company agrees not to engage in a lock-out.

Section 1.04 Recognition of the Duties of Employees. (a) In recognition of the fact that the Company is a public utility which is obligated to provide continuous and adequate service to the public, each employee covered by this agreement has a special duty to assist the Company in maintaining that service by rendering competent, efficient and diligent service at all times in the performance of his job.

(b) In the event of any interruption or threatened interruption of the service supplied or to be supplied by the Company to the public, the Union and each employee covered by this agreement hereby promise to assist the Company in preventing the interruption and in restoring, maintaining and continuing normal service to the public.

Section 1.05 Purpose of Agreement. (a) The purpose of this agreement is to facilitate the peaceful adjustment of all disputes which may arise from time to time and to promote harmony and efficiency in the departments of the Company in which employees covered by this agreement are employed.

(b) It is the intent of the Company and the Union that they will cooperate with each other to promote harmonious relations, mutual good will and efficiency, and it is not the intent or desire of either party to engage in any subterfuge or to evade or circumvent the spirit and intent of this agreement.

Article 2, in turn, contains provisions for the "Settlement of Grievances" and "Arbitration."

The parties stipulated (G.C. Exh. 2) that on August 17, 1983, employee Herbert King was suspended from duty for refusing to cross a picket line and perform his assigned work at the property of Indiana Bell Telephone Company in Indianapolis. The work in question involved reading a meter and changing a cassette tape which records peak power usage by Respondent's customer, Indiana Bell. Two days later, on August 19, Respondent Company—after consultation with representatives from the Charging Party Union—decided to assess a 2-1/2-day disciplinary suspension against employee King for his refusal to perform his assigned work duties.

General Counsel's Exhibit 2, the stipulation of the parties, includes the written notice issued to employee King, dated August 23, 1983, which recites in part:

> On August 17, 1983, the employee refused to cross picket lines to perform job duties and was insubordinate when he failed to follow the direct orders of authorized supervision.
> . . . .
> Employee is hereby notified that refusal to cross picket lines to perform job duties and/or acts of in> subordination are intolerable and subject to immediate discharge. The termination penalty is being reduced to a 2-1/2 day suspension due to the Union's pledge to inform the membership of its responsibility under Section 1.03 of the agreement, and due to the employee's 32 years of long and loyal service. Future similar acts will justify immediate termination.

King protested the above notice, asserting, inter alia, that crossing the picket line to maintain continuous service to the customers in an emergency is different; this was routine work and not an emergency. The Union also protested, asserting, inter alia, "[T]he Union did not, nor do we now, agree with [the Employer's] assertion that the agreement precludes concerted action of the type that resulted in Mr. Herb King's suspension."

The parties, in support of their positions concerning the waiver issue, introduced the following evidence pertaining to the bargaining history and interpretation of the contract language now in dispute. Thus, on December 16, 1974, as stipulated (G.C. Exh. 2), seven company employees received disciplinary suspensions because they refused to enter a jobsite to do work, i.e., refused supervision's orders to enter the construction area of the Big Eagle apartment project where they had underground construction work duties to perform; there were three male carpenters at the main entrance to the project who were striking and there was no form of restraint to prevent entrance to this project. The Union then filed a grievance, and the "Dept. Head's answer—He didn't feel that there was a picket on job site . . . he felt he had to take disciplinary action in response to the men's refusal to work." The Company later denied the Union's allegations of violation of the labor agreement by imposing the above discipline, and asserted the no-strike clause prohibited such action by the employees.

In addition, as further stipulated (G.C. Exh. 2), on April 3, 1978, a company employee received a reprimand for an unexcused absence from work. The Union's chief steward did lead the members across the picket line approximately one-half hour after the stipulated starting time, and the disciplined employee's leaving the site was unauthorized either by his supervisor or his union steward.

It was further stipulated, with reference to the bargaining history, that in 1973, during negotiations for a renewed agreement, the Charging Party Union proposed to amend section 1.03 as follows (G.C. Exh. 2):

> [A]mend to include—after word lock-out—it is also the policy of this IBEW L.U. not to cross picket lines which are established by AFL-CIO or Independent Labor Organizations.

And, in 1975, the Union proposed to amend section 1.03 and section 1.04(b) as follows (G.C. Exh. 2):

> Section 1.03 . . . During the term of this agreement, and any extension or renewal thereof, the Union and each employee covered by the agreement agree not to cause, encourage, permit, or take part in any strike, picketing, sit-down, stay-in, slowdown, or other curtailment of work or interference with the operation on the Company's property and the Company agrees not to engage in a lock-out.

Section 1.04(b), as proposed, would eliminate reference to the interruption or threatened interruption of service to be supplied.

In addition to the above stipulations, Bruce Sumner, business manager for the Union, testified that he attended the initial 1972 contract sessions; that the Union did not then propose any language dealing with the right to strike; that there was discussion between the parties in those negotiations about the right to strike; and that he could not recall any of it. Sumner was unclear and uncertain as to specifically what the Company said this no-strike language would cover. Sumner, however, added, "The substance was that they [the Company] could not have a contract that did not have some [no-strike] protection" and "We [the Union] would not agree to language that was totally restrictive."

Sumner turned to the 1973 contract negotiations. He explained that the Union proposed General Counsel's Exhibit 2(c) during the negotiations because "this was some language that I had received earlier from the AFL-CIO or the IBEW in D.C. as the suggested language for our contract." Prior to 1973, according to Sumner, there had been no problems with regard to the no-strike language in the 1972 contract. Sumner then claimed, "I wanted to strengthen the language in the contract, Art. 1.03, as far as crossing picket lines anywhere," and, therefore, he proposed General Counsel's Exhibit 2(c) in 1973. The Company, as noted, rejected this proposal. Sumner, when asked if the Company gave any reasons for not agreeing to General Counsel's Exhibit 2(c), testified, inter alia, "I cannot remember every specific right now." Sumner added, "We withdrew the proposal." Sumner assertedly did not, by withdrawing this proposal, agree that employees would have to cross all picket lines.

Sumner then addressed the 1975 contract negotiations. Sumner noted that earlier, in 1974, "we had a problem . . . there was a construction going on . . . there was an information picket on the site [and] there were six or seven [employees] laid off for three days." The 1974 dispute, as noted supra, concerned crossing a picket line at the Eagle Apartment site. The Union filed a grievance over these suspensions; the grievance ws never arbitrated; the dispute was held in abeyance until the 1975 contract negotiations; the grievance was discussed during the 1975 negotiations; and the Union then proposed General Counsel's Exhibit 2(d)—"this proposal refers to only on the Company property." Sumner testified:

> Q. Did you intend this to be a change in the agreement?
> A. Just in how it is handled. It would have been a change in the language . . . it would make it more restrictive . . . but it would not be a change in how it had been handled in the past.

This union proposal pertaining to the no-strike language was withdrawn. Sumner claimed that the withdrawal was predicated on an assumption that the Company did not want the people or equipment hurt from crossing picket lines. Sumner generally asserted that during the 1972, 1973, and 1975 negotiations the Union did not tell the Company that employees would not participate in sympathy strikes. Sumner testified that before the summer of 1983 the employees were not forced to cross picket lines; the employees would cross a picket line only in an emergency situation.

Further, Sumner recalled discussing employee King's refusal to cross a picket line with management during August 1983. Initially, Company Representative Lowell McGaughey had assured Sumner that the Employer would send out other people to read the meters and pull the tapes. Later, however, Company Representative Robert McGraw "told me [Sumner] that . . . he had talked to Mr. Snyder [counsel for the Employer], and due to the 7th District Case [sic], that these guys [including King] were going to read the meters." McGraw apparently was referring to the recent court of appeals decision in United States Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 711 F.2d 772 (7th Cir. 1983). Sumner denied agreeing with management that employee King had been insubordinate by refusing to cross the picket line at the customer's premises; however, he did agree with management that he would have "a meeting with the people to discuss crossing lines"—he did not agree to instruct them to cross such picket lines.[1]

The Union's International representative E. J. Bailey testified that he was involved in the 1972 negotiations for an initial contract, that the Company then proposed the language contained in sections 1.03 and 1.04 as quoted above, and that the Union made no proposal pertaining to these provisions. There was, however, a long discussion of the no-strike clause. Bailey recalled:

> The Company took the position that this [sec. 1.03] covered all types of . . . strikes or related activities. . . . And the Union took the position that this was not necessarily the case, and we discussed at great length the employees' right to refrain from crossing the picket line, to be in sympathy with the strikers that were manning that picket line.

Bailey testified on direct examination:

> Q. Did the parties ever reach agreement on whether or not employees would have a right to refrain from crossing picket lines during that negotiation?
> A. No, the Company never did accede to our argument, nor did we to theirs.
> Q. Was the language itself agreed on as part of the contract in these negotiations?
> A. Yes it was.
> Q. But you're saying that there was no agreement as to what the language meant?
> A. No.
> Q. Did the Union specifically agree during those negotiations that the employees would waive their rights to engage in sympathy strikes?
> A. No, we did not.[2]

Bailey, as he further testified, participated in the discussions with management pertaining to the disciplinary action taken against employee King. Bailey denied that the Union, at this discussion, agreed that King had violated the no-strike provision of the contract or had been insubordinate. The Union, according to Bailey, agreed, in effect, to "tell the employees that when the Company gives you an assignment you've got to carry out that assignment." Bailey testified on direct:

> Q. Did you discuss with the Company whether or not you would instruct them to cross a picket line to do that?
> A. No. I don't believe we did.

Elsewhere, Bailey explained:

> The gist of the conversation [with management] was that we would instruct our people that the Company made work assignments, and that we would carry out the work assignments, and I think I mentioned to the Company that we were down there to kiss and make up and get Mr. King back to work, and forget the whole thing.

As Bailey noted, King was put back to work; however, he was not paid for his suspension.[3]

[1] On cross-examination, Sumner explained that in 1972 there was no talk about sympathy strikes and whether or not the no-strike clause would apply to such a strike. There were discussions about sympathy strikes in 1973 when the Union proposed a change in language for sec. 1.03. And, in 1975, when the Union again proposed a change in language for sec. 1.03, there was discussion about sympathy strikes. Sumner testified, in part:

> Q. Is it your testimony that during the negotiations in 1975 any spokesman gave you an assurance that employees would not be disciplined in the future for refusing to cross the picket line as these six or seven employees were disciplined in December 1974?
> A. I don't recall . . . any Company officer or spokesman saying that in that particular way. No.

[2] Bailey also attended some of the 1973 negotiations between the parties for a renewed agreement. He assertedly did not witness any discussion of the no-strike clause. Bailey identified G.C. Exh. 2(c) as the Union's proposal in 1973; however, again, he did not witness any discussion on this proposal. Bailey claimed that in 1973 there was no agreement to waive the employees' right to engage in sympathy strikes.

Bailey attended some of the 1975 negotiations between the parties. Bailey again claimed that there was no agreement by the Union that this contract language would preclude the employees from participating in a sympathy strike.

[3] Bailey, on cross-examination, claimed that the Union's position in the 1972 negotiations was that sec. 1.03 "was tied to Union Security, and also the discussion relative to crossing the picket lines." Bailey added: "The Union was taking the position that they would instruct their members to—in emergency work—cross all picket lines, and the Union was taking the position on non-emergency work . . . their members couldn't and shouldn't be required to cross picket lines."

Bailey was recalled for further cross-examination. His testimony concerned the 1972 negotiations. Bailey acknowledged, "I think what my notes was saying to me is that we could buy this language providing we get an understanding across the table on picket lines . . . we wanted an understanding that no one would be forced to cross the picket lines." Bailey claimed: "We were asking that if the people encountered picket lines . . . the Company make other arrangements to perform their work." Bailey discussed the linkage between the no-strike provision and the union-security provision. The Union knew the Company wanted some

Donald Presly, an employee and union member, testified that on several occasions since 1972 he has encountered picket lines at customers' premises when attempting to read meters; that he requested permission from the pickets to cross the picket line; that, if he was refused such permission by the pickets, he made a "notation . . . that there was a strike in progress and the pickets requested that I not cross the picket line"; and that "I never heard anymore from it." Presly claimed that "until this current [1983] incident . . . there was never any conflict." Presly explained that he never crossed a picket line until August 1983 when the pickets objected to it; that he was never directed by anyone in management or supervision to cross a picket line where the pickets objected before August 1983; and that on August 17, 1983, management:

> . . . informed us at that time that one of our fellow employees, Herb King, had already been disciplined and laid off for the refusal to cross the picket lines at the [specified] locations . . . and we were reminded that we had a contract . . . that had a no-strike clause.

Presly then crossed the picket line. Presly added: "[T]he only two places . . . that I've ever crossed a picket line where I was not permitted . . . was at the Western Electric and Greyhound location"—all following the King disciplinary action.

Randy Lucas, an employee and union member, testified that he, too, encountered picket lines on two occasions. On one such occasion in 1981, he was sent to read meters; he declined to cross the picket line; he reported to the Company that "I couldn't read the meters . . . they were on strike"; and "there was never anything said about it." On the second such occasion, "the day before Mr. King didn't get the stop," in August 1983, he again refused to cross a picket line and he was not ordered to do so or threatened with discipline.

James Thompson, an employee and a union member, testified that he has encountered picket lines at customers' facilities twice since 1972; that on one such occasion he did not cross the picket line; that the Company in that case made other arrangements; that on the second occasion he in fact made his delivery; and that his supervisor, Shirley Bennett, later "told us we shouldn't have crossed the [second] picket line." Thompson was not threatened with any discipline for his refusal to cross a picket line—he was not "instructed" to cross a picket line.[4]

Dennis Richards, an employee and union member, described the procedure which he normally followed when he arrived at a customer's site and found a picket line on the premises as follows:

> [Y]ou were there to do the job . . . you tried to get across without any altercation or problems and read the meters and change the tape and bring it back in.

Richards would ask the pickets for permission to "cross the picket line to do my job." If permission was refused, he went on to another job and turned the work slip in that evening. Richards was never ordered by management to cross picket lines or threatened with discipline.

Richards next recalled the incident in the summer of 1983 involving the Indiana Bell facility. He did not cross the picket line and so advised management. Later, Richards and King were informed by management not to honor the picket line and do your job. Coworker King, according to Richards, was laid off the next day. Richards, however, was granted permission to cross the picket line at his particular site. Richards recalled that management, during this incident, explained to him that the "Seventh [Circuit] Court of Appeals . . . in July . . . had affirmed some other decision or something that companies have the right to tell anybody to go across anybody's picket line, or something to that effect." Richards, at the time, explained to his superior, Lowell McGaughey, "I don't know what you're talking about"—"I'm not a lawyer."

Finally, employee Herbert King related the sequence resulting in his discipline during August 1983 for refusing to cross a picket line at the Indiana Bell facility. King refused to read the meter at the site because of the presence of pickets. Initially, management said nothing to King. Later, however, he was instructed, with coworker Richards, "to go out and get these stops." King recalled:

> Mr. McGaughey said, we have a job to do inside Western Electric here . . . if you think that you are legally covered from going in there . . . . you can forget it; the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has overturned [a] ruling.

King refused and, as stipulated, was disciplined. King, prior to 1983, had refused to cross picket lines and was never instructed to do so.

Albert Burnside, division superintendent for Respondent, testified with reference to the refusal of seven employees to cross a picket line at the Big Eagle Apartment site during December 1974. Burnside then went to the site and, as he explained, "I looked the situation over and really did not see any picket line . . . I don't recall any sign." The employees involved "just told me [Burnside] that there [were] pickets on the line, and they were asked not to cross it, and they did not." Burnside noted that there were no pickets there when he arrived. The seven employees, as stipulated, were later disciplined. Burnside claimed that they were disciplined for not crossing the picket line. However, Burnside acknowledged that his "boss, Mr. Meko," did not feel that there type of no-strike clause and the Company knew the Union wanted some type of union security. The Union ultimately only got maintenance of membership and checkoff. Finally, Bailey claimed:

> I believe your position [the Company's position] was that as these problems came up . . . the Company had made arrangements in the past, and you [the Company] expected them to make arrangements in the future, but you [the Company] never did accede completely to our argument.

[4] There was also similar and related testimony by employees Robert Bell, Danny Walker, William Vest, Oscar Mitchell, Phillip Brown, Robert Davis, Charles Anderson, Phillip Elza, Ralph Miller, and Raymond Lee.

was a picket on the jobsite and he had to take disciplinary action in response to the men's refusal to work.[5]

Robert Adams, now director of installation and metering for Respondent, testified that between 1978 and 1980:

> I cannot recall a specific incident where we were never able to enter the customer's premises. There may have been times may be that we did not cross the picket line on the first encounter, but usually the men would either try to work back later in the day or we'd try to pick it up the next day.

Adams, when apprised that an employee had not taken a reading or changed the tapes because of a picket line, would give it to another person. Adams noted that since 1980 metering is a higher technology; magnetic tapes were installed; and if a meter tape ran out the recorded data would be lost to the Company. Adams further testified:

> Q. All right. Now you've heard the testimony of a number of your employee subordinates that prior to August of 1983 none was ever ordered to cross a picket line. Is that correct?
> A. Yes. I've heard that.
> Q. And is that true?
> A. As far as I know being ordered, I'd say that's true.
> Q. Prior to August of 1983 did any employee, any employee subordinate of yours, refuse to cross a picket line?
> A. Not to my knowledge. Well, let me rephrase that. They did not cross primarily because they were not allowed to cross.
> Q. Allowed by whom?
> A. By the picket line.

Adams was then asked, "[W]hat occurred in August of 1983 . . . that brought about the change whereby Mr. King and Mr. Lucas . . . were ordered to cross the picket lines." Adams claimed:

> . . . it came to my attention . . . that there were several Bell accounts [tapes] that we weren't getting . . . I proceeded to call Employee Relations and asked for the next step that we were going to have to do to try to get in to get these tapes . . . because it wouldn't be long before the tape would be running out.

Jerry Fogleman, supervisor of Respondent's installation demand division, testified that in February 1980 he was informed that employee King did not read a meter because of a strike at a customer's site; that Fogleman was instructed by his superiors that under the no-strike clause in the bargaining agreement the employees were expected to cross picket lines to perform their jobs; that he explained this to King; and that he then drove King through the line and King performed his assignment. Fogleman acknowledged on cross-examination that, when he drove King "across the line" in February 1980, there was no objection whatsoever from the pickets.[6]

Bobby McGraw, director of labor relations for Respondent, testified that during the 1972 contract negotiations the Union took the position that a no-strike clause would depend on a union-security clause and, further, the Union did not particularly want to get anybody in any trouble or hurt in any way crossing the picket lines. The Company's response was that "it was not the Company's intention to get anybody hurt at anytime. We would afford them any safeguards . . . that would be required to cross the picket lines." The Union did not, during 1972, state any position or present any argument whereby a distinction was drawn between picket lines on company property and picket lines elsewhere.

McGraw turned to the 1973 negotiations. There was very little discussion about sympathy strikes. McGraw added:

> I can't recall whether they [the Union] had a distinction [between picket lines on Company property and elsewhere] . . . . I think there was a proposal at that time. I'm not real clear on it. [See G.C. Exh. 2(c).]

McGraw turned to the 1975 negotiations. McGraw testified:

> I think Mr. Sumner's position was that he . . . had no intention of striking the Company . . . I don't recall specific arguments the he put forth.

McGraw added: "The Company's spokesman stated very clearly and precisely that there would be no contract without a no-strike clause that included sympathy strikes." As for the pending grievance pertaining to the seven employees who had refused to cross a picket line in December 1974, the suspension penalty was partially reduced.[7]

McGraw then cited an incident in 1974 where employees initially refused to cross a picket line at the Market Street Arena. McGraw explained to the employees that "we had a no-strike clause"—"they were either to do the work or they would be sent home." The employees did [5] Morris Hiser, a lines manager for Respondent, testified that he was superintendent of overhead lines in 1975; that employees were scheduled to make a new connection at a new building; that there were pickets at the site; that the mud at the site was dry or soggy and there was no need to be in a big hurry; and that the employees were apparently not instructed to cross the picket line. Cf. the testimony of William Vest (Tr. 192–196).

Patrick Collins, an employee, related an incident in 1978 with a picket line at the service center at Indianapolis Power and Light. An independent union, which represented the clericals, was picketing. The Charging Party's steward "said to us [Collins and his coworkers] that we didn't have to cross the picket line." Collins and his coworkers then left the area and went to Collins' home. Collins was later instructed by Union Representative Sumner "that we had to go back to work . . . we were going to be fired." Collins acknowledged that this picketing was at "Ipalco's premises . . . rather than on customer's premises."

[6] Employee King, on rebuttal, was asked if Fogleman had discussed the no-strike provision in the contract with him during February 1980. King testified, "Not that I remember." King insisted that he was not directed to cross the picket line in February 1980.

[7] McGraw had visited the Big Eagle Apartment site in 1974 and observed pickets present during his visit. McGraw assertedly apprised the pickets that his employees would be crossing the picket line, and they said there would be no problems. Respondent's crew later arrived and entered the premises.

the work. McGraw next cited an incident in 1978, "at our station down in Petersburg," involving the Company's clerical employees and an independent union. McGraw again apprised the Union that "we had a no-strike clause and I expected them to go to work." The employees crossed the picket line. One employee was later disciplined. McGraw then cited an incident in 1981 at the Villadrome site. There were pickets present. McGraw again apprised the employees that the Company had a no-strike clause and their failure to cross the picket line would result in disciplinary action. The union representatives instructed the employees to cross the picket line.

On cross-examination, McGraw acknowledged that the Market Square Arena and Villadrome disputes "were both situations . . . where IPALCO had assigned particular work to its employees and Local 481 was claiming that that work should be its work under its jurisdictional definition." McGraw agreed that basically the Local 481 pickets were there protesting the fact that work was assigned to the IPALCO employees. And, as noted, the Petersburg incident involved the Company's premises and its clericals.

McGraw acknowledged that during the 1975 contract negotiations:

> . . . a Company spokesman stated there would not be a contract without an agreement that there would not be sympathy strikes . . . . [The Union] in fact responded to that proposal by saying that the Union was just as adamant, that they were not going to waive their right to sympathy strikes.

In short, the Union did not specifically agree to give up its right to sympathy strikes.[8]

B. Discussion

It is not seriously disputed here that an employee, like Herbert King, has a statutory right to honor a lawful picket line at the premises of his employer's customers. Cf. NLRB v. Browning-Ferris Industries, 700 F.2d 385 (7th Cir. 1983). The question raised in this case is whether or not the Charging Party Union has waived that statutory right. In United States Steel Corp., 264 NLRB 76 (1982), enf. denied 711 F.2d 772 (7th Cir. 1983), the Board majority stated (at 79):

> The Board and the courts repeatedly have held that a waiver of the right to engage in sympathy strikes will not be inferred simply from a broad, general no-strike clause in a contract, but that such a waiver must be clear and unmistakable. Where, as here, the contractual no-strike language does not expressly prohibit sympathy strikes, a waiver of the right to engage in such strikes may be established by bargaining history or other extrinsic evidence showing the parties' clear intent.

The Board majority concluded in United States Steel, "[W]e perceive no express contractual language or evidence of bargaining history to support a waiver." Id. at 80. See also W-1 Canteen Service, 238 NLRB 609 (1978), enf. denied 606 F.2d 738 (7th Cir. 1979). I am, of course, obligated to apply the foregoing principles as restated by the Board.

In the instant case, there is no express contractual language prohibiting sympathy strikes and, as counsel for Respondent acknowledges (Br. 13), "under current Board authority, broad no-strike clauses without more are insufficient to establish a waiver of the right . . . to engage in sympathy strikes." Further, the extrinsic evidence adduced here pertaining to bargaining history and past practices falls far short of establishing the parties' clear intent to waive this statutory right. Indeed, this extrinsic evidence, as summarized supra, serves only to demonstrate the equivocation and division of the parties with respect to this issue.

For example, Union Representative Bailey credibly testified that, from the outset of negotiations in 1972, the Company took the position that section 1.03 "covered all types of strikes and related activities, and the Union took the position that this was not necessarily the case, and the parties discussed at great length the employees' right to refrain from crossing a picket line." Bailey explained that the parties never reached agreement on whether or not employees would have the right to refrain from crossing picket lines—"the Company never did accede to our argument, nor did we [the Union] to theirs." Bailey restated the positions of the parties over the years, as follows:

> I believe your position [the Company's position] was that as these problems came up . . . the Company had made arrangements in the past, and you [the Company] expected them to make arrangements in the future, but you [the Company] never did accede completely to our argument.

And Company Representative McGraw acknowledged, during the 1975 contract negotiations, that:

[8] Terrence Truax, supervisor of the Company's system operations division, testified with reference to electricians performing work in substations at premises where a picket line was in place. Truax claimed that he had no knowledge or did not recall any instances where an electrician had been unable to carry out assigned work because of the presence of pickets.

The evidence summarized above is in large part undisputed. There are, however, some conflicts in testimony. With respect to the testimony principally pertaining to the 1972, 1973, and 1975 bargaining history, I note that the testimony of Sumner for the Union and McGraw for the Employer was at times vague, incomplete, and unclear. I am persuaded here that Bailey for the Union gave a more complete and reliable account of this sequence. Insofar as the testimony and recollection of Sumner and McGraw differs from the testimony and recollection of Bailey, I credit the latter. Further, I also credit the testimony of employees Presly, Lucas, Thompson, Richards, and King as summarized above. Their testimony is in part mutually corroborative and is also substantiated in part by the related credible testimony of employees Bell, Walker, Vest, Mitchell, Brown, Davis, Anderson, Elza, Miller, and Lee. Insofar as the testimony of Burnside, Hiser, Collins, Adams, Fogleman, McGraw, and Truax differs from the testimony of the above employee witnesses, I find the testimony of the employee witnesses to be more candid, complete, trustworthy, and reliable on this record. In particular, I note the conflict between Fogleman's recollection of an incident in 1980 and King's recollection of the same incident. I find here that King has candidly and credibly related the pertinent sequence of events. Fogleman, on the other hand, did not impress me as a reliable witness.

> . . . a Company spokesman stated that there would not be a contract without an agreement that there would not be sympathy strikes . . . the Union was just as adamant that they were not going to waive their right to sympathy strikes.[9]

The evidence pertaining to the past practices and understandings of the parties from 1972 on manifests similar mutual equivocation and uncertainty. For example, a number of employees credibly testified, as detailed supra, that prior to 1983 they were not required by the Employer to cross picket lines at the premises of customers. They were not threatened with discipline. And Company Director Adams acknowledged that "there may have been times maybe that we did not cross the picket line on the first encounter, but usually the men would either try to work later in the day or we'd try to pick it up the next day." There is, of course, testimony that seven employees were disciplined in 1974 assertedly because of their failure to cross such a picket line. However, as noted, the record suggests that management, in the 1974 incident, "did not feel that there was a picket on the jobsite and, consequently, it had to take disciplinary action in response to the men's refusal to work. Other cited instances of threatened disciplinary action or actual disciplinary action taken since 1972, as discussed above, also do not provide the clear intent required. Thus, the cited Market Square Arena and Villadrome disputes involved work assigned by Respondent to its employees and Local 481 was claiming jurisdiction to this work; the Petersburg incident involved the Employer's premises and its clerical employees; and the stipulated 1978 incident apparently involved an unexcused absence from work.

In sum, the broad no-strike clause in this case is insufficient to establish a waiver. And the extrinsic evidence adduced does not show the parties' clear intent. Therefore, absent a clear and unmistakable waiver of employee King's statutory right to refrain from crossing the picket line in question, I find and conclude that Respondent, by its suspension and threatened discipline of King, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act as alleged.

[9] As stipulated, the Union in 1973 and 1975 unsuccessfuly proposed specific contractual language pertaining to sympathy strikes. However, these unsuccessful attempts to include in a collective-bargaining agreement a statement of the statutory rights of employees do not sufficiently demonstrate a waiver of these statutory rights. See W-1 Canteen Service, supra.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent Company is an employer engaged in commerce as alleged.
2. The Charging Party Union is a labor organization as alleged.
3. Respondent Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by suspending and disciplining employee Herbert King and by threatening employee King with discharge because of his refusal to cross a picket line and perform his assigned job duties at the premises of Respondent's customers.
4. The unfair labor practices found above affect commerce as alleged.

REMEDY

Respondent Company will be directed to cease and desist from engaging in the conduct found unlawful herein, and like or related conduct, and to post the attached notice. Affirmatively, Respondent Company will be directed to make whole employee Herbert King for any loss of earnings or employment benefits he may have suffered as a result of his unlawful suspension. Backpay will be computed with interest in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). In addition, Respondent Company will be directed to expunge from its files any reference to the above suspension and to notify employee King that this has been done and that evidence of his unlawful suspension will not be used as a basis for future discipline against him. If employee King has been counseled or assessed with any other form of disciplinary action as a result of having been unlawfully suspended, Respondent Company must restore him to the status he otherwise would have occupied.

International Longshoremen's Association Local 1588, AFL–CIO and Atlantic Cement Company, Inc. and International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 825, AFL–CIO. Case 22–CD–429

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed 6 April 1984 by the Employer, alleging that the Respondent, International Longshoremen's Association, Local 1588, AFL–CIO (ILA Local 1588), violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 825, AFL–CIO (the Operating Engineers). The hearing was held 22 May and 14, 15, and 28 June 1984 before Hearing Officers Gregory Burke and Raymond Heineman.

The Board affirms the hearing officers' rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, a Delaware corporation, is engaged in the wholesale distribution of cement at its terminals in Newark and Bayonne, New Jersey, where it annually receives goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from points located outside the State of New Jersey. The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that ILA Local 1588 and the Operating Engineers are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of the Dispute

The Employer receives and ships loads of bulk cement at its Newark and Bayonne terminals. It owns barges of two sizes, class A and class B barges, which it uses to transport cement to these two terminals. Class A barges carry 18,000 short tons, and class B barges carry 6500 short tons. The Employer unloads about 25 class A barges and about 50 class B barges at both terminals combined in 1 year. The Employer ships out the cement by barges and by truck. It ships about two loads out of its Bayonne terminal on its class B barges in a year, and it ships about 50 loads out of both terminals on customer barges in 1 year. The customer barges are owned by the Employer's clients and carry smaller loads ranging from 600 to 2500 short tons. The Employer's truck shipments are not involved in this proceeding.

On its class A and class B barges, the Employer uses barge crews referred by International Longshoremen's Association, Local 333, AFL–CIO (ILA Local 333) with which it has a collective-bargaining agreement. It also employs about five or six terminal employees, who work regular 40-hour weeks and are represented by the Operating Engineers. The most recent contract covering the terminal employees is effective from 11 November 1983 to 11 November 1984. The terminal employees maintain and operate the Employer's storage facilities and the loading equipment used to load and unload the barges and trucks; they work several shifts so that someone is on duty around the clock when loading or unloading operations are scheduled. Class A barges take from 12 to 30 hours to unload and class B barges take from 12 to 36 hours to unload, depending on how full they are.

For over 15 years before April 1984, the Employer also used two additional men, Joseph and Michael Benedetto, to perform line handling and hose hookup work at both of its terminals when barges arrived and departed. When the Benedetto brothers first began working at the Employer's terminals, they were members of ILA Local 1588 and were employed through John W. McGrath Co. (McGrath), a stevedore and terminal operator that was a member of the New York Shipping Association (NYSA) and signatory to successive collective-bargaining agreements between NYSA and the ILA covering longshore work in the port of New York. Later, Joseph Benedetto transferred his membership to International Longshoremen's Association, Local 901–1, AFL–CIO (ILA Local 901–1), which represents marine carpenters employed under the NYSA-ILA contract in the port of New York, and McGrath was succeeded by International Terminal Operating Co., Inc. (ITO), also a stevedore and terminal operator that is a member of NYSA and signatory to the NYSA-ILA contract. Although the Benedettos were paid by ITO, they had no other contact with ITO and the Employer's Terminal Manager Giorgio kept their timesheets, called them in to work as needed, supervised their work, resolved their grievances, and provided them with tools and equipment. The Benedettos were called in to work as a team whenever a class A or B barge was arriving or departing from either of the Employer's terminals, an average of about two times a week. Their line handling and hose hookup work took about 1 hour upon the arrival and 1 hour upon the departure of each barge, but they were paid for the entire time the barge was being unloaded, between 12 and 36 hours, because they were required to remain "on call" for that period.

Before April 1984 the line handling and hose hookup work at the Employer's terminals was performed as follows. When a class A or B barge arrived at one of the terminals to be unloaded, the Employer's barge crew cast off the lines used to secure the barge to the dock; the Benedettos caught the lines and tied up the barge; the barge crew hooked up one end of the flexible discharge hose on the barge, placed the hose into a boom on the barge, and swung the boom out over the dock; the Benedettos then hooked up the other end of the hose on the dock by removing a cover plate and bolting the hose to the opening on the dock. When a class B barge arrived to be loaded, the barge crew again cast off the lines to be tied up by the Benedettos; the terminal employees operated a hydraulic boom that swung a loading spout out over the barge; and the Benedettos and the terminal employees worked together to connect the loading spout to the scuttle opening on the barge. Any time a class A or B barge departed from the terminal, the reverse procedures occurred. As to customer barges that arrived to be loaded, the Benedettos performed no work at all. Rather, the terminal employees caught the lines and secured the barge to the dock, operated the hydraulic boom to swing a loading spout out over the barge, and connected the loading spout to the hatch on the barge. When customer barges departed, the terminal employees also performed the reverse procedures.

Over the past 15 years, the Operating Engineers had periodically asked the Employer why it did not use the terminal employees to perform the line handling and hose hookup work on all the barges. During negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement in November 1983, the Employer stated it would not be able to grant any economic increases because it was losing more than $7 million already in 1983, and the Operating Engineers then demanded that the Employer stop paying the Benedettos not to work and give all the line handling and hose hookup work to its terminal employees if it was serious about reducing costs. The Employer signed an agreement with the Operating Engineers effective 11 November 1983 that it would assign this work to its terminal employees and made plans to implement the agreement in April 1984.

In late March 1984, ILA Local 1588 President Fullam received a grievance alleging that an employee working at the Employer's terminals was not a longshoreman. Fullam appointed a committee of three ILA Local 1588 officials to investigate this grievance. The committee met with the Employer's Terminal Manager Giorgio and Joseph Benedetto on 2 April 1984. During this meeting, ILA Local 1588 Vice President Lachnicht told Joseph Benedetto, "You don't work here. You are a carpenter." Joseph Benedetto responded that Fullam knew about it, and the other two ILA 1588 officials said if Fullam knew about it, "there is no problem." On 3 April 1984, Fullam met with Terminal Manager Giorgio and told Giorgio that Joseph Benedetto "don't work here no more" and that if Giorgio needed any more men he should call the hall. Fullam also handed Giorgio a business card with his name listed as president of ILA Local 1588 and the telephone number of the ILA Local 1588 office. On 5 April 1984 Fullam called Giorgio and asked him to come to ILA Local 1588's office, but Giorgio told Fullam he should talk to Vice President Johnson of the Employer's parent company, Newmont Mining Corporation. Fullam then called Johnson and asked when the Employer was "going to quit using the wrong ILA and start using the right ILA at those two terminals." Johnson said they were assigning the work to their own terminal employees under an agreement with the Operating Engineers and as a result of a review of their practice at all of their terminals they would not be using ILA members as supplemental labor any more. Fullam responded, "You do that and I'll strike you down there and up at Brooklyn too."[1] Fullam continued, "I'm not asking for anymore people down there . . . but they will be out of my local and not the wrong local and it won't be some damn carpenter who shouldn't even be unloading." Later that day, Fullam and Lachnicht met with Giorgio; they told him he was "running scared," and Lachnicht handed Giorgio a piece of paper with Lachnicht's home telephone number on it, saying, "If ever you need anybody, any time, any day or night, you call this number."

About 6 April 1984 when the next barge was scheduled to arrive at one of the Employer's terminals, the Benedettos reported for work and were prevented from entering the Employer's facility. Since that time, the Employer's terminal employees have performed all of the line handling and hose hookup work for barge arrivals and departures at the Employer's Newark and Bayonne terminals.

[1] Fullam denied that he made any threats to strike or picket during this conversation.

B. Work in Dispute

The parties were unable to agree on a description of the work in dispute. The notice of 10(k) hearing defines the work in dispute as:

> The tie up and hook up work associated with the unloading of cement barges at the Employer's Bayonne and Newark, New Jersey docks as performed by one of the two persons assigned to perform said work by or through International Terminal Operators and its predecessor, McGrath Stevedoring Company.

The Employer took the position that this definition was sufficient; however, ILA Local 1588 contended that it was claiming the work performed by both Benedettos. The Operating Engineers took no position on this issue.

We find that the work in dispute is the line handling and hose hookup work associated with the loading and unloading of class A and class B cement barges at the Employer's Newark and Bayonne, New Jersey terminals.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends that the work should be assigned to its employees represented by the Operating Engineers, arguing that the collective-bargaining agreement, employer assignment and practice, area and industry practice, the relative skills of the employees, and economy and efficiency of operation all favor such a result.

ILA Local 1588 initially claims that there is no jurisdictional dispute in this case within the meaning of either Section 10(k) or Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act. Thus, ILA Local 1588 contends that it took no action against the Employer, made no threats against the Employer, and did not cause any employees to refuse to perform work. Further, ILA Local 1588 argues that in disputing the Employer's assignment of this work to its terminal employees, ILA Local 1588's objective was limited solely to the preservation of work that had traditionally been performed by the employees it represents. Alternatively, ILA Local 1588 contends that even if a 10(k) dispute does exist, the disputed work should be awarded to the employees it represents because of the following factors: a prior Board certification, the NYSA-ILA contract, the Employer's past practice, area and industry practice, and the relative skills of the employees.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

As to the statutory requirement of reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated, Vice President Johnson testified that during the 5 April telephone conversation ILA Local 1588 President Fullam threatened to strike the Employer if it assigned the disputed work to its terminal employees. Although Fullam denied making this threat, a conflict in the testimony does not prevent the Board from proceeding under Section 10(k), because the Board is not charged with finding that a violation actually occurred but only with determining whether reasonable cause exists for finding a violation.[2] Thus, we do not rule on the credibility of the testimony at issue, but we find that Johnson's testimony provides reasonable cause to believe a threat to strike was made.

It is also clear that an object of Fullam's threat was to force or require the assignment of the disputed work to employees represented by ILA Local 1588 rather than to employees represented by the Operating Engineers. Fullam's statements all show that he intended to claim this work for employees represented by his local. Further, we are unpersuaded by ILA Local 1588's assertion that in claiming this work it was motivated solely by a valid work preservation objective. ILA Local 1588 never asked the Employer to keep using the two employees who had been doing the disputed work, i.e., the Benedettos. Instead, ILA Local 1588 directed all its efforts toward acquiring this work for its own members, even trying to get rid of one of the Benedettos because he was a member of a different ILA local. Thus, Fullam told Giorgio on 3 April that Joseph Benedetto could no longer work at the Employer's terminals because of the grievance which alleged he was not a longshoreman and that Giorgio should call the local if he needed any more men. Fullam also asked Johnson to get rid of Joseph Benedetto because he was a member of ILA Local 910–1 rather than ILA Local 1588, stating on 5 April that the Employer should "quit using the wrong ILA and start using the right ILA at those two terminals." After Johnson told Fullam the Employer was assigning the disputed work to its terminal employees, Fullam reiterated this demand, stating that the employees doing the work "will be out of my local and not the wrong local and it won't be some damn carpenter who shouldn't even be unloading." Finally, ILA Local 1588 Vice President Lachnicht told Giorgio on 5 April to call Lachnicht at home if he ever needed any men. Such attempts to secure work for the Local at the expense of the dislocated employees show that ILA Local 1588 was merely seeking to protect its own interests rather than to preserve the employment of the Benedettos. Thus, ILA Local 1588 did not have a legitimate work preservation objective.[3] Accordingly, we find that reasonable cause exists to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act has been violated.

As to the second factor, the parties stipulated, and we find, that no agreed-upon method exists for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

ILA Local 1588 contends that the Board certification in New York Shipping Association, 116 NLRB 1183, 1188 (1956), covering a unit of longshore employees in the port of New York, favors an award of the disputed work to employees it represents. In that case, the ILA was certified to represent a multiemployer unit of "all longshore employees engaged in work pertaining to the . . . loading and unloading of cargoes, including . . . handling lines in connection with the docking and undocking of ships" for employer-members of NYSA. The ILA and NYSA are parties to a master contract covering this unit. The evidence is clear, however, that the Employer has never been a member of NYSA and is not otherwise bound by this NYSA master contract with regard to the line handling and hose hookup work. ILA Local 1588 argues that the certification and contract should apply to the Employer because it is a joint employer of the Benedettos with ITO, which is a member of NYSA and a party to the ILA contract. It is undisputed that the longshore unit involved in this certification and covered by the NYSA-ILA contract conforms in scope with the jurisdiction of the New York Waterfront Commission, which is limited to companies that are "carriers of freight by water" and excludes "carriage by barge of bulk cargoes consisting of only a single commodity." Therefore, regardless of whether the Employer is a joint employer of the Benedettos with ITO, the certification and the NYSA-ILA contract do not favor an award of the work in dispute to ILA Local 1588-represented employees.

The Employer and the Operating Engineers are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement covering hookup and line handling functions involved in loading and unloading barges and specifically assigning this work to the Employer's terminal employees. We find that this contract supports an award of the work to employees represented by the Operating Engineers.

2. Company preference and past practice

The Employer has assigned the work in dispute to its employees who are represented by the Operating Engineers, and the record indicates that the Employer maintains a preference for this assignment. Before April 1984, the Employer subcontracted the work in dispute to ITO, which assigned the work to employees represented by ILA Local 1588. Accordingly, we find that the factor of employer assignment and preference favors an award of the work to employees represented by the Operating Engineers, but the factor of employer past practice favors an award of the work to employees represented by ILA Local 1588.

3. Area and industry practice

The Employer's terminal manager Giorgio testified, without contradiction, that two employers with terminals adjacent to the Employer's terminals regularly assign line handling and hookup work associated with the loading and unloading of barges carrying oil and chemicals to their own terminal employees rather than to employees referred by a stevedore. Vice President Johnson testified, without contradiction, that carriers on the east coast and in Galveston, Texas, typically use terminal employees to perform line handling work in connection with the unloading of barges carrying cement or petroleum products in bulk. Therefore, we find that the factor of area and industry practice supports an award of the work to employees represented by the Operating Engineers.

[3] See Boilermakers Local 6 (Pacific Far East Lines), 224 NLRB 222 (1976); Plumbers Local 208 and Local 3 (Midwest Engineering Service), 199 NLRB 790 (1972).

4. Relative skills

The record establishes that both groups of employees have performed the disputed work. Inasmuch as there is no evidence that either group of employees possesses significantly superior skills related to the performance of this work, we find that this factor favors neither group of employees.

5. Economy and efficiency of operation

The record discloses that the Employer paid ITO substantial fees for the work performed by the two Benedettos in the year before April 1984. It is undisputed that the Employer's terminal employees have always been present while the Benedettos performed the work in dispute and that since April 1984, when the terminal employees began doing all of the line handling and hose hookup work, the Employer has not paid its terminal employees for any additional hours over what it would have had to pay them even if the Benedettos were still doing the disputed work. Thus, it is clear that the Employer's operations are more economical and efficient as a result of its assignment of this work to its employees represented by the Operating Engineers. Accordingly, we find that this factor strongly supports an award of the work to employees represented by the Operating Engineers.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by the Operating Engineers are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the collective-bargaining agreement, employer assignment and preference, area and industry practice, and economy and efficiency of operation. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by the Operating Engineers, not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Atlantic Cement Company, Inc. represented by International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 825, AFL–CIO are entitled to perform the line handling and hose hookup work associated with the loading and unloading of class A and class B cement barges at Atlantic Cement Company, Inc.'s Newark and Bayonne, New Jersey terminals.

2. International Longshoremen's Association, Local 1588, AFL–CIO is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Atlantic Cement Company, Inc. to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, International Longshoremen's Association, Local 1588, AFL–CIO shall notify the Regional Director for Region 22 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing Atlantic Cement Company, Inc., by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

Americana Healthcare Center and Laborers' International Union of North America, Local 438. Case 10–CA–19274

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 6 July 1984 Administrative Law Judge Howard I. Grossman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed a reply brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Americana Healthcare Center, Decatur, Georgia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We agree with the judge that the parties by mutual mistake omitted the agreed-upon sick leave provision and the Respondent violated the Act by unilaterally terminating the agreed-upon sick leave program. We find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's discussion of the zipper clause and his finding that the Respondent was motivated by antiunion considerations.

We correct the judge's following inadvertent errors: in the second sentence of par. 1 in sec. III,C,1, the first use of "Union" should be "Respondent"; in the last sentence of par. 5 and the first sentence of par. 11 in sec. III,G, the "September 29 proposal" was made between 29 September and 20 October 1981.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD I. GROSSMAN, Administrative Law Judge. The original charge was filed on May 25, 1983, and an amended charge on June 3 by Laborers' International Union of North America, Local 438 (the Union or the Charging Party). A complaint issued on November 2, alleging that Americana Healthcare Center (Respondent) unilaterally discontinued the sick leave benefits of certain of its employees on March 9, 1983, without notice to the Union, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

A hearing was held before me in Atlanta, Georgia, on February 13 and 14, 1984. On the entire record, including briefs filed by the General Counsel, Respondent, and the Charging Party, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Delaware corporation with an office and place of business at Decatur, Georgia, where it is engaged in operating a nursing home. During the calendar year preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent received gross revenues in excess of $100,000, and purchased and received at its Decatur, Georgia facility goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Georgia. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The pleadings establish and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The pleadings, as amended at the hearing, establish that, following a Board election, the Union was certified in March 1979 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of certain of Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit.[1] Respondent filed objections to the election which were overruled, and thereafter refused to bargain. The Board's Order that it do so was enforced by a United States Circuit Court of Appeals in April 1981.

B. The Bargaining Prior to December 9, 1982

On May 8, 1981, Union Representative Donnie M. Dennison wrote a letter to an Americana lawyer requesting bargaining and information about employee benefits. The letter was answered on May 18, 1981, by James E. Dick, director of human resources.[2] He promised cooperation, and on June 1, 1981, wrote Dennison a letter describing various employee benefits including sick leave. Dick's letter describes the latter as follows: "Sick leave commences after 600 hours of employment. Each additional 200 [hours] worked accrues for paid hours up to

[1] The appropriate unit is:

All full time and regular part time service and maintenance employees employed by the employer at its Decatur, Georgia, facility, including all nurses' aides, physical therapy aides, unit clerks, housekeeping employees, maintenance employees, dietary employees, and laundry employees, but excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, technical employees, licensed practical nurses, and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[2] During the contract negotiations in 1981, Americana Healthcare Center was owned by a company named Cenco Incorporated, which employed Dick. During the same time period, other negotiations were underway whereby Cenco agreed to sell Americana to Manor Healthcare Corporation. The exact date of the sale is not clear from the record, but Dick lost his job as a result of it, according to James F. McCormick, an official with Manor Healthcare. Dick did not appear as a witness at the hearing.

120 hours total. The benefit commences on the second day of excused absence. In December upon application, we will pay out to employees up to one half of remaining sick leave due" (G.C. Exh. 6). Respondent's administrator Patricia Sheppard further explained the policy as an accrual of 4 hours of sick leave for every 200 hours worked (after 600). On July 24, Dick sent Dennison his "basic contract," which says nothing about sick leave (G.C. Exh. 7).

The first bargaining session was held on August 25 and, at that time, Dennison gave Dick a proposed contract which contained sick leave provisions more favorable to the employees than those outlined by Dick. The provisions are numbered "Article XXXIV" and entitled "Sick Leave" (R. Exh. 2, p. 22). The parties agreed on a few articles during this session, and Dennison evidenced his assent by writing "OK" and the date in the margin opposite the relevant article on his copy of Dick's "standard contract." There was no agreement on sick leave at this session.

On September 11, 1981, Dick wrote Dennison a letter with "enclosed updated copies of our pending labor agreement. Please note that I hopefully have corrected the errors discovered during our last meeting, as well as incorporated much of the language you proposed." (G.C. Exh. 8.)

A second meeting was held on September 29, but sick leave was not discussed. However, just before the third meeting, on October 20, the Company submitted to Dennison its position on various subjects, including sick leave. This position reads as follows:

> SICK LEAVE
> The Company rejects the proposed language contained in Article XXXIV, Sick Leave but will agree to a sick leave program providing that after 600 hours of active employment an employee shall accrue 4 hours of credit for use as sick leave for every 200 hours, and providing further that pay for one-half of an employee's accrued, unused hours may be requested at Christmas and will be paid in the last payroll check before December 25 [G.C. Exh. 10-v].[3]

On November 11, 1981, Dick sent Dennison a letter with "a lot of material" he had promised on October 20. In it was a repetition of the Company's position on sick leave, with a note that it was an "open item" (G.C. Exh. 11). It was an "economic" item, and was marked "pass" on a summary Dick sent to Dennison (G.C. Exh. 11-E).

The parties met again on November 17 and 18, and the Union submitted "economic proposals" on items which were still open. These included paid holidays, funeral leave, vacation, sick leave, and wages.[4] The sick leave proposal reads: "Accrue eight (8) hours credit for every 200 hours worked not to exceed 120 hours." (G.C. Exh. 12.) As noted above, the existing accrual rate was 4 hours of sick leave credit for every 200 hours. According to Dennison, Dick said that he would respond to the Union's economic proposals at the next meeting. On December 1, Dick sent Dennison an updated copy of the contract incorporating the changes agreed on during the last session, together with a covering letter (G.C. Exhs. 13(a), (b)).

C. The December 9 Bargaining Session

1. Summary of the evidence

The last bargaining session took place on December 9. The Union was represented by James E. Dick and Mary K. (Jennie) Watkins, while the Union was represented by Dennison, Joyce Brown, Lucille Humphries, and Deborah Allen.

Dennison testified that the Company submitted a written response to the Union's economic proposals. Copies of the response are in evidence, and present the Company's position on the topics with the same numbering as that given in the Union's economic proposals. With some exceptions, the Company agreed to the Union's proposals on holidays, funeral leave, vacations, and wages.

Dick also brought with him a document entitled "Contract Highlights." This document outlines topics on which the Company had given employees increased benefits, or topics on which Dick claimed that the Company was giving its employees more than other companies in the area. There is no reference to sick leave in this document (G.C. Exh. 15).

> SECTION FOUR
> The Company will not change its computation methods during the term of the agreement [G.C. Exh. 14].

Dennison testified that the Union accepted the Company's proposals, subject to ratification, although he could recall little that was said about sick leave. On cross-examination, he said that the intended contract language was that set forth in the Company's response.

Several copies of the Company's response were given to the union negotiators, according to Dennison. On one of them, the letters, and date "OK, 12/9/81" appear on the sections covering funeral leave and vacations, while the date "12-9-81" and letters "O.K." appear after the section on sick leave (G.C. Exh. 14). Dennison testified that the latter notations were in his handwriting and were made on December 9. Another copy of the Company's response has similar notations on all issues except the first (paid holidays), as well as the one on sick leave, which reads "O.K., 12-9-81" (R. Exh. 3). Dennison said that he thought the writing on this exhibit was that of Union Negotiator Joyce Brown, except for the approval and date indicated for sick leave, which were his. He testified that Brown and he worked on the proposals together, and that evidently he had picked up her copy.

[3] The Company's October 20 statements of position include the following: "The Company rejects the Union's proposed language contained in Article VIII, Seniority, Section 40 Seniority Lists, but will agree in a side letter that such lists will be made available when requested." (G.C. Exh. 10-B.) The Union accepted this resolution of the matter and withdrew its proposal (G.C. Exh. 11). Other company positions either accept, reject, or request clarification of union proposals. According to Dennison, seniority was the only topic in which the parties agreed to a side letter.

[4] The Union's proposals were numbered as follows: section one, paid holidays; section two, funeral leave; section three, vacations; section four, sick leave; section five, wages.

Respondent introduced notes of the bargaining sessions which Dennison made on a yellow note pad. His notes of the December 9 meeting include the following: "(4) Sick Leave—same OK." "O.K.'s" also appear with reference to other of the Company's proposals (R. Exh. 1).

Another subject, not specifically contained in the "economic proposals," was the Union's request that the Company supply uniforms to its employees. Dennison testified that Dick agreed to do so, but did not want to "put it in writing." Dennison denied that Dick expressed any such restriction on the subject of sick leave.

Lucille Humphries also testified about the subject. Although she was a union representative at the time, the parties stipulated that she was made a supervisor some time in late June 1983, and that she gave an affidavit to a Board agent on June 22, 1983.

Humphries testified that the Union agreed to the Company's position on sick leave on the "next to the last 2 days . . . in December." On cross-examination, she referred to a continuing dispute over the Union's request for uniforms for employees, and the discussion of sick leave. According to Humphries, Dick said to Dennison: "Now, Donnie, we can go around and around with this thing for 6 more months. Now I'm telling you just the way it is. The Company is not going to back down on sick time. They will not change. Now, we have this matter about uniforms. We will agree to give the bargaining unit one uniform per year if you will accept the sick time the way it is." The union representatives then agreed, according to Humphries.

Humphries said that she kept records of the negotiations in a little book, which she considered to be her private property. After she had "talked with the man from the Labor Board," i.e., had given her affidavit, she "thought that it was all over and that we wouldn't have to be bothered with it any more." Accordingly, she destroyed her notes.

On behalf of Respondent, Mary K. (Jennie) Watkins testified that there was no discussion of sick leave during the December 9 session. She further affirmed that she took notes of the last meeting, and had destroyed them. Before doing so, Watkins claimed, she reduced them to typewritten form, and this document is in evidence. It is dated December 9, 1981, and relates that Dick discussed paid holidays, funeral leave, sick leave, wages and hours of work, and overtime. Humphries asked that the sick leave policy be explained, and Watkins responded. The union representatives protested the absence of uniforms, and Dick agreed that the Company would give every employee a uniform in December, but would not put it in writing (G.C. Exh. 20).

Watkins admitted that Respondent had a copy of Dick's book of notes of the negotiations. At first, she said that she could not remember whether she had ever looked in the book, but later admitted discussing its contents with Administrator Sheppard, including the provisions concerning sick pay.

2. Factual analysis

Respondent moved to strike Humphries' testimony because of her admission that she had burned her notes. The General Counsel opposed the motion on the ground that such destruction took place at a time when Humphries was a company supervisor. As noted above, Humphries testified that she destroyed her notes after giving a Board affidavit, on June 22. Also, she was made a supervisor in "late June." I denied Respondent's motion to strike, a ruling which I reaffirm. The record is inconclusive as to whether Humphries was a supervisor when she destroyed her notes, but it would appear likely that she was. In any event, I credit her testimony that the reason she did so was her belief that it was "all over."

Humphries was in error about the date sick leave was discussed, as there was only one negotiating day in December. However, it is clear from Watkins' typed notes that sick leave was discussed on December 9. Aside from this error as to date, Humphries was a believable witness, and I credit her testimony that Dick told the Union he would give uniforms to employees if the Union would accept the Company's position on sick leave. This is partially corroborated by Watkins' notes. Watkins' testimony that sick leave was not discussed is flatly contradicted by her typewritten notes. Further, unlike Humphries, she gave no reason for destroying her original notes.

In essence, Humphries' testimony supports Dennison's averment, corroborated by his notes of the negotiation, and his "O.K.'s" on Respondent's proposals, that the Union accepted them on December 9, including the one on sick leave, subject to ratification.[5] I so find. I also credit Dennison's testimony that Dick promised to give uniforms to employees but said that he did not want to put it in writing, and that he failed to make any such reservation with respect to sick leave.

D. The Ratification and the Signing of the Contract

There was a ratification meeting of union members on the same day as the last bargaining session, December 9, 1981. Dennison went over Dick's "Contract Highlights" with the members. He also told them that sick leave benefits would remain the same.

The contract was executed on January 5, 1982, during a luncheon at a restaurant. It contains sections on four out of the five "economic subjects" about which the parties had bargained on November 17 and 18, and December 9,[6] but there is no section dealing with sick leave. Article XVIII, dealing with on-the-job injuries," states in part that "No charge will be made against accrued sick leave for on-the-job injuries" in certain circumstances.

[5] I do not consider Dennison's admission that he approved of the sick leave provision on another union representative's copy as damaging to his credibility. With a number of copies of the Company's proposal on the bargaining table, this is not unlikely.

[6] The following articles deal with the indicated topics: art. XI, funeral leave; art. XIII, wage rates; Art. XIV, holidays; and art. XV, vacations (Jt. Exh. 1).

The contract is signed on page 26 by Dick for the Company, and by various union officials including Dennison. Page 27 is an appendix containing wage rates, while page 28 has additional provisions relating to supervisory compensation, and the following sentence: "A new uniform will be ordered for each employee in the month of December of each year." This latter statement is signed by Dick and a union official (Jt. Exh. 1).

Dennison skimmed through the contract at the luncheon, but did not read it word for word. His reason, he said, was that he had had prior negotiations with Dick, and that he had no reason to doubt that it represented the agreement of the parties. Also, Dick told him that if there were any errors, they could be worked out at a later time.

Mary K. (Jennie) Watkins testified that Dick told the union representatives to be sure and "look over" the contracts before signing them, and that Dennison replied that that would not be necessary. However, Lucille Humphries, a company supervisor at the time of her testimony, averred that Dick said it would not be necessary to proofread the contract, because they could "get together" on any errors. I credit Humphries.

Humphries asserted that, despite Dick's statement, she did look through the contract, and protested to Union Representative Joyce Brown that it was not printed the way it was negotiated. Brown replied that any problems could be taken care of at a later time.

Administrator Sheppard contended that she had a conversation with Humphries in late 1982 in which the latter said that she had called Dennison and had told him that there were "five points" left out of the contract, and that Dick had given them only 10 days to get back with correction of errors. Although Humphries testified about concern over the management rights clause, she denied ever discussing sick leave with Dennison. The reason, Humphries asserted, is that she continued to receive sick leave benefits, and was still getting them at the time of the hearing. Administrator Sheppard confirmed that, although sick leave was terminated for unit employees in 1983, it was not terminated for nonunit employees and Humphries was a supervisor by June 1982. I credit Humphries' denial that she ever discussed sick leave with Dennison.

E. Respondent's Administration of the Contract and the Termination of Sick Leave Benefits

Dick did not instruct the staff to discontinue payment of sick leave benefits, although he did conduct a training session on the contract for his supervisors a few months after its execution. According to Sheppard, Dick did not discuss sick leave during this session. Sheppard herself did not go through the contract carefully for some time, and the Company routinely approved requests for sick leave during 1982. No charges against accrued sick leave were made for on-the-job injuries, in accordance with the contract.

Some time in the fall of 1982, Sheppard had a conversation with Manor Healthcare Official McCormick, since Manor Care at that time owned Respondent. She said that she could not find anything about sick leave in the contract, and asked McCormick to look at the contract provision concerning "oral understandings."[7] According to Sheppard, McCormick called back and told her to pay the employees their "buy-back" sick leave benefits for Christmas 1982, but to terminate all sick leave benefits in 1983, "since it's not in the contract." Sheppard testified that she did not inform Dennison of this decision.

McCormick agreed that he made the decision to terminate sick leave benefits. There was no such provision in the contract, and he had the right to do so under the "zipper" clause (art. XXVIII) and other clauses. His object was to reduce operating costs, McCormick stated. He said that the Company would "prefer" to operate in a nonunion environment, although he had told Respondent's managers that he could work with the Union.

In December 1982, Respondent posted a notice that the Company would be paying for unused sick leave according to its policy, but that the Union had left sick leave out of the contract. Dennison received a call from a union steward that something was amiss about sick leave, and called Sheppard. About a week later, she called back and said that sick leave benefits would be paid that year as they always had been. It was about then that Dennison discovered that the sick leave provision was not in the contract. The payments for Christmas 1982 were not received until the first week of January 1983.

In late January 1983, Dennison asked Company Attorney Carl Becker why the Company was late in paying sick leave benefits. Becker replied that he was new with the Company, but would consult with McCormick first. Becker told Dennison that he would be back to discuss the matter with him prior to some pending arbitration cases. "We'll also take care of the uniforms and the sick benefits. There will be no problem," said Becker.

In the first week of February 1983, a union steward informed Dennison that an employee was denied sick leave benefits, and that Mary K. Watkins had said that such benefits were left out of the contract. Dennison called Sheppard, and she told him to talk to Becker. Although

Section 1. The parties agree that this Agreement contains their full and complete understanding and that any prior practices, benefits or oral agreements are superseded by the terms of this Agreement. The parties further agree that no oral understandings, practices or benefits will be recognized or regarded as binding unless committed to writing and signed by the parties as a supplement to this Agreement and that the Company may, in its discretion, discontinue or modify the provision of any benefit or privileges not required under this Agreement.

Section 2. Since this agreement expresses the understanding of the parties in respect to all matters deemed by them to be applicable to the Bargaining Unit, for the term of this Agreement, the Company and the Union each voluntarily and unqualifiedly waives the right, and each agrees that the other shall not be obligated, to bargain collectively with respect to any subject or matter referred to or covered by this Agreement, or with respect to any subjects or matters not specifically referred to or covered by this Agreement, and even though such subjects or matters may not have been within the knowledge or contemplation of either or both of the parties at the time they negotiated or signed this Agreement.

Section 3. The Company does not by this Agreement waive any rights, legal or equitable, which it would otherwise have except as specifically defined and provided in this Agreement, which sets forth all understandings and agreements arrived at by the parties.

Sheppard denied a "demand for bargaining," she did not deny this call. Dennison called the following day, and Becker replied that he had not yet had sufficient time to go over everything, but would "come in here" in early February and discuss sick leave benefits. However, no such meeting ever took place. Dennison had an arbitration with Becker on February 23, but there was no discussion of sick leave. At another arbitration on March 2, Becker failed to give Dennison a "direct answer."

F. The Termination of Sick Leave

Mardell Storey, an occupational therapist, testified that Mary K. Watkins told her in February that sick leave could not be honored for an employee in the hospital because it was not in the contract.

There was a meeting on March 9 between Assistant Director of Nurses Donna Thompson[8] and nine nurses' assistants. Nurses assistant Lizzie Bryant testified that Thompson said that "when the Union negotiated the contract, they left out sick leave," and that the Union had been in arbitration two or three times. Shop Steward Regina Hutchison added that Thompson said to blame the Union, because it was not in the contract. Thompson admitted saying that sick leave was not in the contract, but denied the other statements attributed to her. I credit Hutchison and Bryant.

About 30 minutes later, the nurses held a meeting with Administrator Sheppard. Bryant testified that Sheppard said "that it was left out of the contract, and that the home office had told her that we no longer get it because of the contract." Shop Steward Hutchison averred that Sheppard said that the bargaining unit employees would no longer be getting sick leave, but that the licensed practical nurses and department heads would be receiving it. Sheppard partially admitted the truth of this testimony and I credit it. There is record evidence that the salaries of the nonunit employees were higher on the average than those of unit employees.

On March 29, Becker told Dennison that the Company would not arbitrate the sick leave issue, and that the Union could file an unfair labor practice charge.

G. Legal Analysis and Conclusions

"In determining whether an underlying oral agreement has been reached, the Board is not strictly bound by the technical rules of contract law but is free to use general contract principles adapted to the collective bargaining context. Thus, acceptance of a final offer of a complete bargaining agreement manifests mutual assent, creating a binding bargaining agreement, and therefore triggers the duty to execute a written contract on request embodying that agreement." NLRB v. Electra-Food Machinery, 621 F.2d 956, 958 (9th Cir. 1980)

It is clear that the parties bargained over sick leave as one of the economic subjects. The bargaining history shows that the Company rejected the Union's first sick leave proposal, but then stated that it would agree to a sick leave program which in essence was the existing program, including accrual of 4 hours of sick leave credit for every 200 hours worked up to a maximum limit. The Union submitted a proposal that 8 instead of 4 hours be accrued, and the Company on December 9 responded that it would not change its computation methods, i.e., that it would continue to accrue only 4 hours. Its existing computation methods began sick leave on the second day of excused absence. The Union accepted. The parties thus clearly reached agreement to continue the existing sick leave program.

Did the parties intend this to be an oral agreement or a side agreement? There is no evidence of either intent. Company Representative Dick sought to gain the Union's assent to the Company's position on sick leave by granting a concession on uniforms. The fact that Dick said that he did not want to put the uniform agreement in writing (although he did), but failed to make any such reservation with respect to sick leave shows that inclusion of the latter agreement in the written contract was intended.

Nor is there any evidence that the parties intended a side agreement on sick leave. When the parties intended such an agreement, as on seniority lists, the bargaining history shows it.

On the contrary, the parties met on December 9 to consider five economic subjects, including sick leave. The fact that the written contract contains provisions on four out of five of the topics agreed on by the parties is further persuasive evidence that similar treatment was intended for the fifth subject, sick leave. The fact that the Company's response was not in precise "contract language" does not invalidate this conclusion—other topics upon which the parties reached agreement on December 9 are, similarly, not expressed in precise contract language. Yet the final agreements of the parties on these topics do appear in the contract. Indeed, the Company's September 29 proposal on sick leave, with some modification (eliminating the Company's rejection of the Union's proposal and adding that such leave accrues on the second day of excused absences) indicates the contractual language to which the Company was willing to agree (G.C. Exh. 10-V).

The fact that the contract bars charges against "accrued sick leave" in the case of certain on-the-job injuries is further support for a conclusion that sick leave benefits were intended to be included in the contract. Respondent argues that the parties reached agreement on on-the-job injuries prior to the agreement on sick leave, and, therefore, that the former cannot serve as any indication of what the parties agreed to on the "still open subject of sick leave benefits." On the contrary, the fact that the parties reached such an agreement on on-the-job injuries, to be incorporated in the contract, shows that they intended similar treatment for the "still open" subject.

Such an agreement, barring charges for on-the-job injuries, would otherwise be meaningless, since it would modify a provision not in the contract. This ambiguity requires consideration of extrinsic circumstances in order to determine the intent of the parties. Memphis Furniture Mfg., 252 NLRB 303, 306 (1980).

[8] The parties stipulated that, at the time of the hearing, Thompson was acting as a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

The Company routinely granted sick leave benefits in 1982, and made no charges against such benefits in the case of on-the-job injuries, pursuant to the contract. Respondent's apparent argument, that it was either abiding by an oral agreement or continuing a past practice (on sick leave), but was modifying same with a specific contractual provision, is too strained to be plausible.

Although the Company criticizes Dennison for failure to read the contract, its own conduct was about the same. Dick conducted a training session on the contract a few months after its execution, but did not discuss sick leave. Administrator Sheppard did not read the contract for some time, and it was only in the fall of 1982 that she discovered that it did not contain a sick leave provision, and called McCormick. The fact that Sheppard told McCormick that she could not find anything about sick leave in the contract clearly indicates that she was looking for it, and suggests that she theretofore believed that there was such a provision. This inference is buttressed by the Company's actual administration of the program.

Respondent relies on Mercedes-Benz of North America, 258 NLRB 803 (1981). In that case the parties stipulated that they did not even discuss the topic which was in issue, and the Board declined to make a finding that they had reached agreement on it. There is no such stipulation in this case. Respondent also cites E. I. duPont & Co., 238 NLRB 299 (1978). But in that case the company frequently repeated its determination "to avoid enshrining the terms of its new procedure in a formal provision of the collective bargaining agreement" (238 NLRB at 303). There are no such expressions herein of any determination to exclude sick leave from the formal contract.

I therefore conclude that the parties agreed to a provision on sick leave substantially in the language of the Company's September 29 proposal with some modification, and further agreed that this provision was to be incorporated into the written collective-bargaining agreement. By mutual mistake it was not included in the agreement.

Respondent presents additional arguments. Thus, it contends that the "zipper clause" makes it unnecessary to determine whether, in fact, there was any agreement on sick leave. This argument, if accepted, would make it impossible to correct any mistake in a written agreement, and would bind the parties to a contract which did not reflect their complete agreement. Such a conclusion would also be contrary to the provision in Section 8(d) of the Act requiring a party to reduce to writing any agreement reached, and the Supreme Court's holding that a party may be required to do so. H. J. Heinz Co. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 514, 523–526 (1941).

The Company also argues that the Union "acquiesced" in the agreement, or is "estopped" from contesting its accuracy, because Dennison did not read the contract. Respondent cites a Federal labor arbitration and a Federal district court case and, also, Alameda County Assn., 255 NLRB 603 (1981). The latter is inapposite. The Company in effect argues that mistakes in collective-bargaining agreements should be considered according to the theories of negligence in the law of torts.

In this connection, it should be noted that the credited evidence shows that, at the signing ceremony, Company Representative Dick told the union negotiators that it would not be necessary to proofread the contract. Although Union Representative Humphries said that the agreement was not printed as it had been negotiated, she did not bring up the issue of sick leave. Dennison admittedly did not read the contract in full for almost a year, but neither did the Company. Instead, it administered the contract as if the sick leave benefits were a part of it, inducing Humphries, at least, to believe there was no problem. These facts demonstrate the inadequacy of Respondent's negligence theories.

The better view is that, where a written agreement is not in conformity with the actual intention of the parties, a court of equity will reform the writing in accordance with that intention. Williston, Contracts § 1547 (3d ed.). It is clear that the courts will enforce Board orders requiring a party to execute a contract reflecting the actual agreement of the parties,[9] and this principle supports reformation of the written contract herein.

The General Counsel presents an alternative argument, to wit, that even in the absence of such agreement, Respondent's unilateral change of existing working conditions violated the Act. Respondent argues that it had a right to do so under the zipper clause.

In Pepsi-Cola Distributing Co., 241 NLRB 869 (1979), enfd. 646 F.2d 1173 (6th Cir. 1981), a predecessor employer had been making yearend bonus payments to employees. During contract negotiations, the predecessor's president made a statement indicating that such payments would continue. There was no such provision in the contract, which contained a clause stating that each party "voluntarily and unqualifiedly waives the right . . . to bargain collectively with respect to any subject or matter, whether or not referred to in this Agreement." In addition, the contract stated that the agreement constituted the "complete understanding of the parties with respect to all issues between them and supersedes all written memoranda, agreement or benefits heretofore made or given by the parties." (241 NLRB at 869 fn. 2.) Nonetheless, the Board held that the employer and the Union "fully expected the continuation of the bonus payments and there was no clear specific and unmistakable waiver by the Union of this term and condition of employment" (241 NLRB 870). Moreover, the Board imposed the obligation to make bonus payments upon the successor employer, despite the fact that it had no knowledge of the practice at the time of purchase.

In GTE Automatic Electric Inc., 261 NLRB 1491 (1982), the Board allowed the employer to rely on a zipper clause in its refusal to bargain over a new condition of employment, because it did not constitute a unilateral change of existing working conditions and because the bargaining history was completely silent on the matter in issue. However, the Board added, its holding did not disturb cases involving "an employer unilaterally changing the employees' working conditions, then using the zipper clause as a 'sword' to justify its refusal to discuss the unilateral changes made to the status quo [citing Pepsi-Cola, supra]" or cases involving "deceptive conduct during negotiations, so that there is no conscious or knowing waiver of rights" (261 NLRB at 1492 fn. 3). Further, the Board has held, "in order to establish a waiver of a statutory right, there must be a clear relinquishment of the right." McDonnell Douglas Corp., 224 NLRB 881, 887 (1976).

[9] Retail Clerks v. NLRB, 373 F.2d 655 (D.C. Cir. 1967); NLRB v. Central Machine & Tool Co., 429 F.2d 1127 (10th Cir. 1970); NLRB v. Raven Industries, 508 F.2d 1289 (8th Cir. 1975). In Raven, the court failed to enforce that part of the Board's order requiring sick leave to be a part of the contract, based on its disagreement with the Board's finding that the parties had so agreed. The court's reasoning was grounded on the facts that the principal union witness' testimony was contradicted by her affidavit, that the notes of the bargaining indicated that the employer did not agree to sick leave, and that the testimony of other union witnesses was unpersuasive, vague, or uncertain (508 F.2d at 1292–93). This is a far different record from the one in the case at bar.

These principles negate Respondent's argument that it is entitled to rely on the zipper clause in its defense. Thus, whatever its nature, the parties did reach agreement during negotiations to continue sick leave benefits. It was an existing, not a new condition of employment, the parties discussed it and expressed agreement that it continue, and there was no clear relinquishment by the Union of its right to bargain over the issue.

Respondent argues that the Union did not make a bargaining demand after receipt of notice of termination of sick leave benefits. The record shows, however, that Dennison made repeated requests to discuss the matter with Company Attorney Becker, to whom he had been referred by Administrator Sheppard, and was met with responses which can fairly be characterized as evasive.

I do not accept Respondent's argument that it was motivated by the high costs of sick leave, because it continued these benefits for nonunit employees, despite the fact that their salaries were higher than those of the unit employees. This disparate treatment of sick leave, the Company's posted notice in December 1982 saying that the Union had left sick leave out of the contract, and similar statements from a nursing supervisor show that the Company's action was motivated by antiunion considerations.

It is established law that a unilateral change in working conditions is violative of the Act, and I find that Respondent, by unilaterally discontinuing sick leave benefits in January 1983, thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Turnbull Enterprises, 259 NLRB 934 (1982). Such action was also unlawful because Respondent had contractually agreed to continue such benefits, and had agreed to incorporate them in a collective-bargaining agreement. Although this issue was not alleged in the complaint, it was thoroughly litigated.

In accordance with my findings above, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Americana Healthcare Center is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Laborers' International Union of North America, Local 438, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At all times material herein, the Union has been the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the bargaining unit described below within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act. The appropriate bargaining unit is:

> All full time and regular part time service and maintenance employees employed by the employer at its Decatur, Georgia facility including all nurses' aides, physical therapy aides, unit clerks, housekeeping employees, maintenance employees, dietary employees, and laundry employees, but excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, technical employees, licensed practical nurses, and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. On December 9, 1981, during collective-bargaining negotiations, the parties agreed to include the following provision in a collective-bargaining agreement which described a sick leave program already in existence:

> The Company agrees to a sick leave program providing that after 600 hours of active employment an employee, on and after the second day of excused absence, shall accrue 4 hours of credit for use as sick leave for every 200 hours worked, said accrued credit not to exceed 120 hours, and providing further that pay for one-half of an employee's accrued, unused hours may be requested at Christmas and will be paid in the last payroll check before December 25.

5. On January 5, 1982, the parties executed a written collective-bargaining agreement which, by mutual mistake, omitted the agreed-upon sick leave provision.

6. Beginning in January 1983, Respondent unilaterally terminated the existing sick leave program to which it had agreed, and denied sick leave benefits to its employees.

7. Respondent's termination of said benefits constituted an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

8. Respondent's unfair labor practice was an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Pursuant to the foregoing considerations, the collective-bargaining agreement should be reformed so as to reflect the actual agreement of the parties on sick leave.

Selection of the appropriate place in the contract for insertion of this article is not significant, since such placement does not affect substantive rights. Although the article might be placed next to the other articles on leave, I consider it more appropriately placed immediately precedent to article XVIII, which refers to sick leave. Accordingly, the sick leave article would become article XVIII, while the present article XVIII and those following it would be renumbered accordingly.

In addition, those employees who would have been entitled to sick leave benefits should be made whole by providing them with sick leave credit since the Company's unlawful discontinuance of same in 1983. Further, the employees should be compensated for their unused sick leave at the end of 1983 in accordance with established procedure. Although they may not have "requested" same, such requests would have been futile in light of Respondent's unlawful action in discontinuing sick leave benefits. Accordingly, such requests shall be presumed. Compensation shall be made in accordance with Turnbull Enterprises, supra; Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970); and Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). In addition, employees should be notified of these rights. Turnbull Enterprises, supra.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

The Respondent, Americana Healthcare Center, Decatur, Georgia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Denying its employees existing sick leave benefits to which it had agreed.

(b) In any other like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On written request by the Union, correct its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union executed on January 5, 1982, so as to include therein, as article XVIII, the article on sick leave described in the section of this decision entitled "Conclusions of Law," subsection 4; renumber the current article XVIII as article XIX and the following articles accordingly; and furnish the Union with a duly signed copy thereof.

(b) Make its employees whole by granting them the sick leave to which they were entitled beginning in January 1983, including compensation for unused sick leave at the end of 1983, in the manner described in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Notify in writing all persons employed in the bargaining unit after January 5, 1982, of their entitlement to sick leave including potential entitlement to compensation for unused sick leave in 1983.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, leave records, personnel records and reports, and all other records relevant or necessary to facilitate the determination of the amounts due to employees under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Decatur, Georgia facility copies of the attached notice entitled "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[10] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

AMERICANA HEALTHCARE CENTER

Alemite and Instrument Divisions of Stewart-Warner Corporation and International Union of Professional Security Guards, Petitioner. Case 13–RC–16423

31 January 1985

DECISION ON REVIEW AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 3 May 1984 the Regional Director for Region 13 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in a unit of all security guards, sergeants, and lieutenants at the Employer's West Diversey Parkway and West Fullerton Street facilities in Chicago, Illinois. The Employer filed a timely request for review of the decision, contending, inter alia, that the Regional Director erred by failing to find that Petitioner is affiliated directly or indirectly with an organization which admits to membership employees other than guards, and that the Board is therefore precluded by Section 9(b)(3) of the Act from certifying Petitioner as the exclusive representative of the unit described above.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case and makes the following findings.

The Employer, a Virginia corporation, is engaged in the manufacture of electro-mechanical equipment at its Chicago, Illinois locations. On 26 January 1984[1] the Machinery, Scrap Iron, Metal and Steel Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, Handlers, Alloy Fabricators, Theatrical, Exposition, Convention and Trade Show Employees Union, Local No. 714, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, herein referred to as Local 714, filed a petition in Case 13–RC–16381 seeking to represent a unit of the Employer's security guards. On 8 February Local 714 withdrew its petition.

Sometime in early February Michael A. Vendafreddo, the president of International Union of Professional Security Guards, the Petitioner herein, had a conversation with a friend identified in the record only as "Benny." Benny told Vendafreddo that the Employer's security guards desired union representation, but that Local 714 encountered a problem because security guards had to be organized by a union which represents only guards.[2] Vendafreddo told Benny that this information "sounded interesting."[3]

About a week after his conversation with Benny, Vendafreddo met with Benny and Bob Riley, a business agent and organizer for Local 714, at a restaurant near Local 714's office. Although the record does not reveal how this meeting was arranged, Vendafreddo testified that Riley, a longtime friend of Vendafreddo's, "sought me as a person that could take off where they left off." In the meeting, Riley described to Vendafreddo the unsuccessful effort of Local 714 to organize the Employer's guards and said that the situation presented an opportunity for Vendafreddo to start a labor organization. According to Vendafreddo, Riley then "reiterated . . . basically what we wanted to put together."

Following this meeting, Vendafreddo began contacting several friends and acquaintances to solicit their assistance in becoming officers of a labor organization. Sometime later in February, Vendafreddo contacted Bob Riley and asked for information regarding the next steps in organizing the Employer's guards. Riley invited Vendafreddo to Local 714's offices, where Vendafreddo met with Riley and certain other officers and agents of Local 714 whom Vendafreddo had known for years.[4] At this meeting Riley explained that it would be necessary for Vendafreddo to obtain a showing of interest from the Employer's guards. Riley gave Vendafreddo a petition which had been prepared for this purpose, the text of which stated that employees signing the petition expressed their interest in joining Petitioner and understood that no dues would be required until Petitioner executed a collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer.

By mid-March Vendafreddo had contacted numerous friends and had obtained the agreement of Dorothy Olinger, Dale Torii, and Ronald Maxwell to serve as officers of Petitioner. None of these individuals had had any experience in forming or operating a labor organization. Sometime in mid-March Vendafreddo called a meeting attended by Vendafreddo, Olinger, Maxwell, Riley, and several of the Employer's guards. In the meeting Vendafreddo, with the consent of the prospective officers and the employees, appointed himself, Olinger, and Torii, president, secretary, and treasurer, respectively. Riley, who was ostensibly present to discuss Local 714's experience in attempting to organize the guards, spoke in support of Vendafreddo and the opportunity presented by Petitioner. In addition, Riley produced and gave to Vendafreddo a

[2] Vendafreddo testified that he was unsure what Benny does for a living or whether Benny is affiliated with Local 714.

[3] Vendafreddo testified that for a number of years he had wanted to start a labor union.

[4] Vendafreddo testified that he had been to Local 714's offices four or five times before his initial conversation with Benny, and was a friend or neighbor of several officers or agents of Local 714 besides Riley.

showing of interest petition containing the signatures of some of the Employer's guards.[5]

Following this meeting, Riley presented Vendafreddo with a completed representation petition, requiring only Vendafreddo's signature. Vendafreddo signed the instant petition and turned it over to Petitioner's attorney, who filed the petition on 19 March. About 27 March Vendafreddo telephoned Riley and asked what procedures would follow the filing of the petition. Riley informed Vendafreddo that he would be contacted by the Board's Regional Office and informed of further steps in the proceeding. The record reflects that, at the time of the hearing herein, Petitioner had no funds or physical assets of any kind, and had not discussed with Local 714 the possibility of further assistance.

The Regional Director found, and it is undisputed herein, that Local 714 is a labor organization which admits to membership employees other than guards. Nevertheless, the Regional Director concluded that neither the extent nor the duration of Local 714's assistance to Petitioner established impermissible affiliation between the Unions and thus found that the Board was not precluded by Section 9(b)(3) of the Act from certifying Petitioner as the exclusive representative of the guards herein. We disagree.

Section 9(b)(3) of the Act states in relevant part that "no labor organization shall be certified as the representative of employees in a bargaining unit of guards if such organization admits to membership, or is affiliated directly or indirectly with an organization which admits to membership, employees other than guards." The Board has held that assistance furnished a guards' union during its infancy by a union admitting to membership employees other than guards does not necessarily establish affiliation between the unions.[6] Nevertheless, while substantial latitude has been permitted in such circumstances, indirect affiliation will be found where the extent and duration of assistance indicates that the guards' union lacks freedom and independence in formulating its own policies and deciding its own course of action.[7]

Here, in the approximately 2 months from withdrawal of Local 714's petition in February to the hearing in April, Petitioner took almost no action independent of Local 714. Thus, Petitioner's president was a longtime friend of officers and agents of Local 714 and was "sought" by Local 714 to continue organizational efforts among the Employer's guards immediately after Local 714 withdrew its own petition. Local 714 prepared the showing of interest petition circulated among the Employer's guards, including therein language which waived dues until a collective-bargaining agreement was obtained by Petitioner. In addition, Local 714 obtained employee signatures on this petition and prepared the representation petition which was filed by Petitioner with the Board. The record also reveals that Petitioner has no assets or expertise suggesting its ability to function independently of Local 714, and Petitioner's president has been continuously dependent on Local 714's officers for advice and assistance regarding every significant aspect of Petitioner's formation. Under all the circumstances, we conclude that the extent and duration of Petitioner's dependence on Local 714 indicates a lack of freedom and independence in formulating its own policies and supports a finding that Petitioner is indirectly affiliated with Local 714.[8] Accordingly, we are precluded by Section 9(b)(3) of the Act from certifying the Petitioner as the exclusive representative of the unit herein, and we shall dismiss the petition.

ORDER

The petition is dismissed.

[5] The petition was of a type originally shown to Vendafreddo by Riley in February. Vendafreddo testified that Petitioner had engaged in no organizing activities at the Employer's premises before the mid-March meeting.

Wedgewood Nursing Home and 115, Nursing Home and Hospital Employees Union, a Division of 1115 Joint Board. Case 29–CA–9996

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 26 August 1983 Administrative Law Judge Steven Davis issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a statement in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, brief, and statement, and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

As more fully set forth in the attached decision, unit employees formed the Employee Council at the Respondent's health care facility in the spring of 1980. Employee Council meetings were initially attended by employees only, but after the first three or four meetings, the members invited the Respondent's administrator to attend. The judge found that the Respondent at a 27 May 1982[2] meeting adjusted employee grievances without providing an opportunity for the collective-bargaining representative to be present as required under Section 9(a) of the Act.[3] The judge found that the attendance of two union stewards at this meeting did not relieve the Respondent of its obligation under Section 9(a). The Respondent contends that it adjusted no grievances through the Employee Council and denies that it refused the Union its statutory right to be present at meetings of the Employee Council.

The pertinent proviso of Section 9(a) states that "any individual employee or a group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer and to have such grievances adjusted, without the intervention of the bargaining representative, as long as the adjustment is not inconsistent with the terms of a collective-bargaining contract or agreement then in effect: Provided further, That the bargaining representative has been given opportunity to be present at such adjustment." The Board has frequently invoked the proviso to require an employer to permit stewards to participate in the grievance process. See, e.g., Winter Garden Citrus Products Cooperative, 116 NLRB 738, 753 (1956); Square D. Co., 105 NLRB 253, 260 (1952).[4]

Union Shop Steward Elmina Kelly testified that she attended the 27 May meeting and had also attended other Employee Council meetings. Assistant Union Shop Steward Ronald Scott testified that over the course of his 2 years in office he had attended every Employee Council meeting prior to October 1982. Both stewards are responsible for investigating and processing grievances. It is therefore undisputed that the Union was not only allowed the opportunity to be present at the 27 May meeting, but it in fact had at least one representative in attendance at every meeting of the Employee Council since that organization's inception. Thus, whether or not the Respondent adjusted grievances at the council meetings—an issue we find unnecessary to reach—it did not deny the Union its right under Section 9(a) to have an opportunity to be present at such meetings.[5]

Accordingly, we find, contrary to the judge, that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its participation in the Employee Council and shall dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] All dates hereafter are 1982.

[3] The complaint alleges, and the judge found, that the Employee Council is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act. We note that the complaint does not allege that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(2) of the Act in its dealings with the Employee Council. Nor does the General Counsel seek disestablishment of the Employee Council. Accordingly, the issue of whether the Employee Council is a labor organization is not material to the resolution of any of the issues presented in this case.

[4] We do not accept the judge's implication, in fn. 18 of his decision, that the second proviso to Sec. 9(a), quoted above, requires employers to notify particular union officials in addition to stewards or similar in-plant union representatives before holding meetings at which employees could air grievances.

[5] Having concluded that the Respondent did not unlawfully deny the Union an opportunity to be present at the 27 May Employee Council meeting, we also find it unnecessary to pass on the Respondent's argument that the complaint is time barred under Sec. 10(b) of the Act.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

STEVEN DAVIS, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to a charge filed on October 4, 1982,[1] by 1115, Nursing

[1] All dates hereafter are in 1982 unless otherwise stated.

Home and Hospital Employees Union, a division of 1115 Joint Board (the Union) a complaint was issued by Region 29 of the National Labor Relations Board on November 30 against Wedgewood Nursing Home (Respondent).

The complaint alleges that Respondent established an "Employee Council," a labor organization, on June 25, 1980, which "exists for the purpose of dealing with Respondent concerning, inter alia, grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, and conditions of work relating to the employees" in certain collective-bargaining units represented by the Union.

The complaint also alleges that on May 27, September 3, and other dates since April 4, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, Respondent met with the Employee Council "for the purpose of adjusting grievances including, inter alia, scheduling of employee vacations and assignment of employee locker facilities, and during said meetings, Respondent bargained with the Employee Council and adjusted said grievances."

The case was heard on April 27 and 28, 1983, in Brooklyn, New York.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the brief filed by Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, owned jointly by Maxwell A. White, Isidore Segal, and Bruce Godt, copartners doing business as and operating under the name of Wedgewood Nursing Home, has maintained its principal office and place of business at 199 Community Drive, Great Neck, New York, where it is engaged in the operation of a residential health care facility providing skilled nursing care and related services. During the past year, Respondent derived gross revenues in excess of $400,000 from its operations, and during the same period purchased and received drugs and medical supplies valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside New York. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

Respondent is and has been a member of the Nassau County Health Facility Association, Inc. (the Association), an organization composed of employers engaged in the health care industry which bargains with the Union in behalf of Respondent.

Since about April 1, 1977, the Union has represented separate units of nursing supervisors, registered nurses, licensed practical nurses, and service and maintenance employees employed by Respondent, and about March 13, 1981, the Association and the Union executed separate collective-bargaining agreements, which run from January 1, 1981, to December 31, 1985, covering those unit employees.

Patricia Bartley, an assistant social worker employed by Respondent, conceived the idea of an Employee Council and recommended to Administrator Frederick E. White that such a council be formed.[2]

On June 25, 1980, White issued a notice to "all staff," signed by him, which stated:

> It has been suggested that perhaps we can improve interpersonal relationships through Employee Council Meetings. By discussing some of our mutual concerns openly we can find new solutions to them and we can better understand each other.
> The ultimate long term goal of these meetings is to improve patient care through cooperation and unity of purpose.

The notice stated that Bartley would conduct the first meeting, which was scheduled for July 3, 1980, "so that everyone can feel free to discuss his/her ideas and thoughts." The notice requested that each department select representatives to attend the meeting.[3]

About 20 meetings were held from July 3, 1980, to September 3, 1982. Bartley conducted the meetings and sometime after the end of each meeting prepared and typed the minutes, which were then posted at Respondent's facility and a copy given to White.

Bartley testified that the ultimate purpose of the Employee Council was to improve patient care. As a means toward that end, the Council was intended to improve interpersonal relations--to personalize the work environment and to establish a better means of communication.

As set forth in the minutes:

> The group felt the importance of the Council was to promote and maintain communication between employees and administration. It was felt that the Council was effective in diminishing tension between workers. A member mentioned that it has helped his shift feel as though they are part of the Nursing Home. They are now given an opportunity to make suggestions, mention problems and ventilate their feelinsg.[4]
> The Council felt . . . that the meetings should continue despite the poor attendance, as they continue to be an important means of communication between employees and administration.[5]

Meetings were held more frequently when the Council was first formed. Thus, in 1980 meetings were held about twice per month. Then in 1981 and early 1982 meetings were held once per month or once every 2 months and, finally, in late 1982 were held once every 3 months.

Employees were selected by their departments to attend the meetings. Two union shop stewards, Elmina

Kelly and Ronald Scott, were among the employees chosen to be members of the Employee Council.

The meetings, held in the activities room or in Bartley's or in White's office, all took place in the afternoon. Employees who were on duty and attended the meeting received their regular pay for the time they spent in attendance.

Administrator White did not attend the first few meetings, and employees' questions and concerns brought up at the meetings were relayed to him by Bartley. His answers and responses to the matters raised were then given by Bartley to the Council members at the next meeting. This delay in response time caused the Council to invite White to the meetings so that a prompt answer could be given to the questions posed. White accordingly began his attendance at the Council with the third or fourth meeting in late 1980 or early 1981. The director of nursing also occasionally attended the meetings.

Inasmuch as the meeting of May 27, 1982, was the only meeting which actually took place within the 10(b) period, I have set forth in full the minutes of that meeting, at which White was present.[6]

> The Council agreed that the atmosphere within the Nursing Home has greatly improved since the initial Council meeting.
> The difficulties expressed at the previous meeting were mentioned, where the employees found difficulty in planning their vacations and when disciplined found difficulty working together. Both problems persist. The Council feels the Nursing Dept. is too large to establish communication between co-workers when planning vacations.
> The Council believes, however, that employees of different disciplines can and should work together on solving problems between departments.
> A problem was mentioned concerning Employee lockers. A notice was posted (near the time clock) by maintenance, asking employees to sign their name by the locker number and that the locker will be shared by three persons, one on every shift. The Employees are not responsive to this notice and will force the facility to assign lockers to employees. It was mentioned that attempts are being made for employees to decide with whom they would like to share their lockers. The staff's unresponsiveness is forcing the facility to assign lockers to employees.
> It was also stressed that employees fill out repair requisitions as this will insure that each requisition will be looked into by the Maintenance Dept.
> A staff member mentioned that the bulletin board is often cluttered with several notices, and an important notice may be overlooked. Mr. White informed that he will insure that the board is cleared periodically. He will also hold these notices for a few weeks in the event that someone may want it returned to them.
> A problem was mentioned concerning linens, as there is a shortage during the evening hours. Mr. White is aware of the situation but stressed that employees discuss this with their supervisors.
> Staff Appreciation day was mentioned as some staff were not aware of what occurred, i.e., who was given awards. It was mentioned that the Staff Appreciation program is extended to all staff/shifts. Recognition is given to department heads as representatives for that department. All staff members are invited to this event.
> The suggestion of an employee outing was discussed. All Council members agreed that this would be beneficial to all staff getting to know one another outside the work environment. The Council believed all staff should decide whether an employee picnic, or an outing to Atlantic City can be planned. Both options will be posted opposite from the time clock and representatives will be sought to present both options to the employees. This will possibly occur during late June or mid-July. An Employee Council may need to be scheduled after staff have decided on the outing.
> The plans for a Christmas party have been canceled due to lack of response and interest.
> The idea of introducing a dog to the facility as a pet was presented. Reportedly another facility has two pet dogs who have provided therapeutic gains for that nursing home's patients. A staff member has offered to donate a cage for the animal, for training purposes. Mr. White informed that a plan must be devised by the Recreation Dept. re: such a program before it can be introduced to the facility.
> A problem has occurred where staff have been careless with the patients' clothing and shoes. Often a patient's belongings will be found in another's closet, and will not be returned to him. It is asked that all staff work together to insure a patient is wearing his own clothes and that one's belongings are where they should be. Clothing is available to the patient who has a shortage of clothing through the Housekeeping Dept.
> The Council commented on the notable improvement of the first floor patio after being repaired. New patio furniture will be purchased to replace the tables and chairs which cannot be used. The benches will be used as they are salvageable.
> It is important that staff be careful while using the patio, not to discard cigarettes on the repaired ground.

The specific discussion which took place with respect to the issues raised at the May 27 meeting are as follows:

Vacations: Certain employees complained that they were required to give extensive notice of their requested summer vacation and that they were unable to determine, far in advance, the date that they wished to take such leave. They also mentioned that due to seniority rules certain workers did not receive the days for vacation that they requested.

White told the employees at the Council meeting that because so many of the employees requested summer vacations, it was necessary that requests be made by March [6] The charge was filed on October 4. An unfair labor practice may not therefore be found based on any activity occurring prior to April 4. See fn. 9 infra.

so that he could hire temporary replacements in advance.[7]

Lockers: At a prior Council meeting, employees complained that there was an insufficient number of lockers to store their personal belongings. Some employees used the patients' closets for this purpose. In order to provide locker space to employees it was apparently decided that three employees (1) for each of the shifts) would share one locker. At the may 27 meeting, a Council member-employee from the maintenance department stated that a signup sheet had previously been posted requesting that employees note with whom they wanted to share a locker. Few employees responded to the signup sheet, and it was announced that assignments of lockers would therefore have to be made.

Linens: Employees complained that the supply of linens was insufficient and that therefore they were unable to provide patient care in that they were unable to change the patients. Bartley conceded that this condition made it difficult for them to perform their job. White responded, as set forth in the minutes, that he was aware of the problem and requested that the employees discuss the matter with their supervisors.

Other issues: I cannot credit the testimony of employees Elmina Kelly and Ronald Scott regarding matters that they believed were discussed at the May 27 meeting such as security, lateness, and calling in sick.[8] However, it is clear that such issues were discussed at prior Employee Council meetings as follows:[9]

Security: Employees complained that their cards were being tampered with in Respondent's parking lot, and requested that its gate be locked. White refused to do so because ambulances use that gate. Employee Scott stated that employees requested that a security guard be assigned to the lot and that floodlights be installed there.

White testified that this matter was raised at an Employee Council meeting and that he considered the employees' request for tighter security in light of certain other, unspecified information he had from sources other than the Council. He accordingly arranged for the hire of an evening security guard in late 1980 or early 1981, and in early April 1983 installed floodlights in the lot.

Lateness: According to employee Scott, Respondent docked employees if they were 15 minutes or more late. Certain employees complained at a Council meeting that workers had been docked when late only 2 to 4 minutes in bad weather. Scott stated that White's response to the complaint was that if the employees expected snow in the morning, they should park their cars close to the curb and not in a driveway, so that they could more easily get onto the street and arrive at work on time.

Calling in sick: Employee Scott and Kelly testified that workers complained that Respondent's rule requiring them to call in sick 3 hours before they were scheduled to report for work was oppressive because most employees have not yet awakened and thus do not know 3 hours before their starting time that they are ill. Scott and Kelly stated that after the complaint was made, Respondent changed its policy to require that employees call in 2 hours before the time that they are due to report to work.[10]

Bartley and White denied that Respondent ever changed its policy or rules as a result of an Employee Council meeting. Bartley stated that when the issue regarding calling-in time was raised, White and representatives of the nursing department, at a later meeting, explained and clarified Respondent's policy. White stated that Respondent's current policy of requiring 2 hours' notice of illness had been in effect on or before May 1980—prior to the inception of the Employee Council—and therefore no change in its call-in policy had been made as a result of the Employee Council meetings.[11]

White stated generally that when he was asked questions at a Council meeting, he explained Respondent's policy and told the employees that if there was a personal or individual problem, they should speak to their supervisor.

The Meeting of September 3

On September 3, Alex De Laurentis, vice president of the Union, made a random visit to the Respondent with Martin Geier, the Union's area director. The purpose of the visit was to ask the unit employees whether they had any complaints and to determine whether any problems they had were being handled properly by the Union's business agents.

While on the premises, De Laurentis heard an announcement which called all members of the Employee Council to White's office. De Laurentis asked some of the employees who were walking toward White's office about the nature and duration of the meetings, and he was told that such sessions have been held for "a while." De Laurentis told the employees not to enter the room until he and Geier accompanied them. White asked De Laurentis what the problem was and De Laurentis replied that White was circumventing ths Union by having an Employee Council which violates the law. De Laurentis and Geier then entered White's office.

[7] I do not credit Bartley's testimony that White invited the employees to speak to their supervisor if they had difficulty in submitting a vacation request and, if the supervisor could not resolve the problem, they should take it to the Union. Her testimony was not reflected in the minutes or supported by the testimony of White or the two employees who testified.

[8] I cannot credit such testimony because the minutes of the meeting did not reflect that such matters were discussed. I must regard the minutes, which were made contemporaneously, as having greater reliability than the memories of the witnesses as to events which occurred 1 year before their testimony. Moreover, the witnesses could not recall precisely when these issues were discussed, and Scott, who examined a copy of the minutes when they were issued, stated that they were accurate. In this connection, I credit the testimony of Bartley and White, as will be set forth infra, that these issues were discussed only at sessions held prior to the May 27 meeting.

[9] Evidence of conduct occurring more than 6 months before October 4, the date the charge was filed, may be relied on as background evidence to shed light on the motive for allegedly unlawful conduct occurring during the 10(b) period. Machinists Local 1424 v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411 (1960); Mechanics Laundry & Supply, 240 NLRB 302, 303 (1979).

[10] Scott testified specifically that White said that it would be sufficient if a call was made 2 hours before the reporting time.

[11] Inasmuch as this meeting occurred outside the 10(b) period, I need not decide whether a change in Respondent's policy was in fact made.

White told them that all that was being discussed was a picnic. De Laurentis replied that he had no objection if that was the only topic to be discussed. Bartley then volunteered that she had minutes of all the meetings, and handed a copy of the May 27 meeting to De Laurentis, who looked at it briefly and asked how "vacations" were related to a picnic.

White then said: "[Y]ou ought to appreciate the fact that I'm doing you a favor—that I take care of problems before it gets you." De Laurentis responded: "That is the problem, that you have no right to take care of the problems without the Union present or without discussing it with the Union."[12] De Laurentis ended by saying that Respondent committed an unfair labor practice and that he would file a charge.[13]

De Laurentis testified that no representative of Respondent ever notified him that it planned to establish an Employee Council or requested to meet and bargain with him concerning such a Council. He first became aware of the Employee Council on September 3. He conceded that to his knowledge Respondent has never refused to arbitrate a grievance and has never refused to meet with him or with any union representative.

White testified without contradiction that in April 1982 he met with a union representative and with certain shop stewards concerning Respondent's vacation policy.

The Collective-Bargaining Contracts

Relevant portions of the parties' collective-bargaining contracts covering the employees involved herein are as follows:

Grievance and Arbitration Procedures

> A. All complaints, disputes or grievances whatsoever of whatever kind or nature arising between the Union and the Employer concerning any provisions of the contract, or with respect to any other acts, conduct or relations or terms or conditions of employment of whatsoever nature or otherwise, between the parties, directly or indirectly, shall be submitted for arbitration . . . .
> B. The procedure herein provided for settling all complaints, disputes or grievances shall be the sole and exclusive remedy of the Union, The Association, member Employer and employees covered by this Agreement, and shall be used to the exclusion of any other means available and such settlement procedure shall be (except to enforce, vacate or modify awards) in lieu of any which will or may be available to the Union, the Association, member Employer and employees. No individual employee may initiate any arbitration proceeding.
> It is agreed that the maintenance of a peaceful and constructive relationship between the Union, the Association, Member Employers and their employees, requires the establishment of cooperative use of the grievance and arbitration machinery for the settlement of all grievances and disputes, and that it would detract from this relationship if Member Employers and individual employees or groups of employees would either as such individuals or groups seek to interpret or enforce this Agreement on their own initiative or responsibility. It is, therefore, agreed that this Agreement shall not vest or create in any employee or group of employees covered thereby any rights or remedies which they or any of them may enforce either at law or in equity or otherwise. It is understood and agreed that all of the rights and privileges created by or implied from this Agreement shall be enforceable only by the Union, the Association and the Member Employers and only in the manner established by this Agreement.

Management Rights

> The management of the establishment and the direction and control of the property and work force shall remain with the Employer. The rights herein described shall include but not be limited to: the right to hire, lay-off, discharge for just cause, in case of emergencies to require that duties other than those normally assigned by [sic] performed, except that "emergencies" shall not exist for longer than two (2) days, to make reasonable working rules and regulations of procedure and conduct; and to determine work shifts, provided, however, that the exercise of all these rights must be consistent with the terms and conditions of this Agreement and are not to be used so as to discriminate against any person by reason of Union membership.

B. The Positions of the Parties

The General Counsel alleges that the Employee Council, a labor organization, exists for the purpose of dealing with Respondent concerning grievances and terms and conditions of employment, and that Respondent met with it, bargained with it, and in fact adjusted certain grievances during the meeting. Although the General Counsel concedes that, pursuant to Section 9(a) of the Act, employees have the right to present grievances to their employer and have them adjusted, she argues that the proviso to that section, that the Union must be given an opportunity to be present at the adjustment of the grievances, has not been met and that the effect of the Employee Council was therefore to undermine and bypass the Union.

Respondent argues that the complaint must be dismissed pursuant to Section 10(b) of the Act. It also contends that the purpose of the Employee Council was not to deal with Respondent concerning mandatory subjects of bargaining, but rather was to promote better communication between employees. Respondent denies that any actual grievances were discussed and further denies that it adjusted any grievances at or after any Council meeting. It contends that its officials merely restated and explained the existing policy concerning issues raised by employees at the Council meetings.

[12] This is based on the credited testimony of De Laurentis. White and Bartley did not contradict his testimony.

[13] Also discussed at the meeting was the issue of the discharge of employee Joan Brennan; Respondent's requirement that employees produce a doctor's note if they were out sick for 1 day, and its use of a form concerning an employee's being able to perform "heavy lifting" on returning from sick leave, which form was objected to by the Union.

C. Analysis and Discussion

1. The 10(b) issue

Respondent asserts that the complaint herein must be dismissed because it alleges that the Employee Council was established on June 25, 1980, more than 6 months prior to the filing of the instant charge on October 4, 1982.

Although it is true that the Council was formed more than 2 years before the filing of the charge, it is clear and I find that the Employee Council was continuously maintained and Respondent dealt with it within the 10(b) period.[14]

2. The merits

Section 9(a) of the Act provides as follows:

> Representative designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representative of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment: Provided, That any individual employee or a group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer and to have such grievances adjusted, without the intervention of the bargaining representative, as long as the adjustment is not inconsistent with the terms of a collective-bargaining contract or agreement then in effect: Provided further, That the bargaining representative has been given opportunity to be present at such adjustment.

The General Counsel argues essentially that the Employee Council, a creature of Respondent, functioned as a means by which Respondent adjusted grievances without the participation of the Union, thereby refusing to bargain with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

It is apparent that the Employee Council was innocently begun by Bartley who, as a zealous social worker assistant, honestly believed that the purpose of the Council would be to "improve interpersonal relations" between employees, thereby benefiting patient care. It thus appears that the purpose of the Council, as initially conceived, was to act as a means by which employees could speak with each other (a) in order to reduce misunderstanding and improve communication between them and (b) to understand how each employee's function in the nursing home relates to the other employees.

However innocently the Council may have been created, and for whatever theoretical purpose it may have been started, it is clear that it was quickly transformed into a vehicle for the solicitation and adjustment by Respondent of employee grievances. Thus, the minutes of the November 24, 1981 meeting stated that the Council believed that its importance was to "promote and maintain communication between employees and administration." (Emphasis added.) The minutes further noted that the Council reduced tension between workers, and employees "are now given an opportunity to make suggestions, mention problems and ventilate their feelings."

There is no question that the problems, concerns, and issues raised by the employees at the Council meetings prior to May 27 and at the May meeting constituted grievances. Prior to May 27, such topics included the security of Respondent's premises with respect to employees' cars in its parking lot, complaints regarding being docked for lateness when the employee claimed he was not late, and opposition to Respondent's policy requiring that employees who call in sick do so by a certain number of hours prior to their scheduled arrival.

Similarly, the subjects raised at the May 27 meeting concerned areas of concern to employees: complaints by employees that they were required to state a preference for a vacation date too far in advance and, due to the seniority system, certain employees did not receive the time for vacation that they requested; complaints by workers that there was an insufficient number of lockers for them to store their personal belongings, and that they used patients' closets for that purpose. In this connection, a request was made that three employees volunteer to share each locker and that they designate who they wanted to share the locker with. The workers did not respond to that request and it was announced that assignments of lockers would be made. Employees also complained that the supply of linens was insufficient, causing them to be unable to provide optimum patient care. Bartley conceded that this situation made it difficult for the staff to perform its job.

There can be no question that the matters raised by the Employees at the May 27 meeting and the prior meetings constituted grievances.

> Grievances are usually more than mere personal dissatisfactions or complaints of employees and their adjustment frequently involves the interpretation and application of the terms of a contract or otherwise affects the terms and conditions of employment not covered by a contract. For this reason, these matters are unquestionably the concern of the bargaining representative.[15]

Respondent argues that, even assuming the issues raised by employees at the Council meetings were grievances, it did not adjust any such grievances as a result of such meeting, but rather simply stated Respondent's policy as to the matters brought up by the Council members. I cannot agree with Respondent. Although it is true that with respect to the vacation issue Respondent restated the reasons for its policy, nevertheless that restatement was a denial of the grievance that employees were required to state their vacation preference too far in advance, inasmuch as it does not appear that Respondent change its policy. The Board has held that the rejection or a denial of a grievance constitutes an "adjustment" of a grievance within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.[16] The Council members also complained that they did not have locker space. This grievance was adjusted at the May 27 meeting by the announcement that lockers would be assigned if employees did not designate whom they wanted to share a locker with. Similarly, the grievance of employees that an insufficient supply of linens prevented them from performing their work was apparently adjusted when White told them to speak to their supervisors. Employee Scott testified that after he raised the issue at the Employee Council, "Mr. White immediately increased the amount" of linens.

It is clear that Respondent did more than merely restate its policies. The Council members requested White's presence at the meetings so that they could receive prompt responses and answers to their questions and problems. If all that White was doing was restating company policy, he need only have given his statement of employer rules to Bartley and she would have read it to the employees.

In this regard I credit the testimony of De Laurentis that at the September 3 meeting he was told by White that "you ought to appreciate the fact that I'm doing you a favor—that I take care of problems before it gets to you."[17]

It is thus apparent that Respondent adjusted grievances without providing an opportuniuty for the collective-bargaining representative to be present at the adjustment. The Union first learned of the Employee Council 2 years after its creation, had not been advised of its formation, and was not present at the adjustment of any grievances through the Employee Council.[18]

I accordingly find and conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by adjusting grievances through the Employee Council without providing the Union an opportunitry to be present at the adjustment,[19]

Although not necessary to my decision herein, I note that the collective-bargaining agreement between the parties contains a broad grievance and arbitration clause[20] requiring all "complaints, disputes or grievances" to be submitted for arbitration, which shall be the sole and exclusive remedy of the Union, the Employer, and employees, and "shall be used to the exclusion of any other means available and such settlement procedure shall be . . . in lieu of any which will or may be available to the Union, the Association, member Employer and employees."

There is no provision for resolution between supervisor and employee of any grievance, and the clause states that it would detract from the peaceful and constructive relationship between the Employer and the Union if "employees and individual employees or groups of employees would . . . seek to interpret or enforce this agreement of their own initiative or responsibility." The contract is thus a clear, firm statement of policy between Respondent and the Union that only they will adjust grievances. Respondent's adjustment of grievances with employees through the Employee Council would appear therefore to be in violation of the contract.

One final issue remains. The complaint alleges that the Employee Council is a labor organization, but no charge alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(2) of the Act has been filed and the complaint does not contain such an allegation. Moreover, the General Counsel does not seek disestablishment of the Council, recognizing that Section 9(a) permits groups of employees to meet with employers to have their grievances adjusted.

Based on the evidence, particularly the fact that the Council discussed with management many grievable items, I find and conclude that the Employee Council is a labor organization in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of meetings with the Employer concerning grievances, wages, hours, and conditions of work within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[21]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Wedgewood Nursing Home is, and at all times material herein has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

2. 1115, Nursing Home and Hospital Employees Union, a Division of 1115 Joint Board and the Employee Council are labor organizations within the meaning of the Act.

3. By unilaterally maintaining the Employee Council through which it solicited and adjusted grievances without permitting the collective-bargaining representative of its employees to be present, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices affecting commerce, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. I shall not order the disestablishment of the Employee Council, but shall order that Respondent cease dealing with it as a labor organization in the solicitation and adjustment of grievances of the [16] Id. at 348.

[17] In attacking the credibility of De Laurentis, Respondent correctly argues that he could not remember other issues discussed at the meeting, including the discharge of an employee and Respondent's requirement of a doctor's note after returning from being out sick. However, I credit De Laurentis' statement attributed to White because White and Bartley did not deny it, and Bartley's minutes of the meeting and the testimony of Bartley and White corroborated De Laurentis' account of his protest regarding the Council.

[18] The fact that two shop stewards were members of the Employee Council and present at the meetings does not relieve Respondent of its responsibility to give the Union an opportunity to be present at the adjustment of grievances. The statutory right to be in attendance under Sec. 9(a) runs to the Union, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representive of the employees.

United States Postal Service and American Postal Workers Union, Baltimore (Stu Filbey) Area Local, AFL–CIO. Case 5–CA–15203(P)

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 9 September 1983 Administrative Law Judge Mary Ellen R. Benard issued the attached decision. Counsel for the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and the Respondent each filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief to the exceptions of the General Counsel and the Charging Party.

On 23 September 1983 the American Postal Workers Union (APWU) filed a motion to intervene in these proceedings. By executive order of 9 March 1984, the Board granted APWU's motion and gave APWU the opportunity to file a separate brief on its behalf. By letter dated 21 March 1984, APWU notified the Board that it did not intend to submit a separate brief but instead joined in the Charging Party's brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

The judge found, and we agree, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening to suspend Union Steward Robert Ripoli because he stated that the Respondent had violated the parties' national agreement and committed an unfair labor practice and that, for that reason, he would leave a meeting of management and union representatives.[3]

The complaint further alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by announcing and implementing a policy requiring the Union to process and file grievances within a specified period each day without affording the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain over the policy. The judge found that this matter should not be deferred to the parties' grievance-arbitration machinery. We disagree.

In United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984), we reaffirmed the principle stated in Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971), that when a dispute arises from a contract between the parties, it should be resolved in the manner that the contract prescribes. The parties' collective-bargaining agreement contains a grievance-arbitration procedure which culminates in "final and binding" arbitration and which defines a grievance as "a dispute, difference, disagreement or complaint between the parties related to wages, hours and conditions of employment [including but not limited to] the complaint of an employee or of the Union which involves the interpretation, application of or compliance with the provisions of the contract."

Article 17, section 3, of the parties' bargaining agreement provides in part:

> When it is necessary for a steward to leave his/her work area to investigate and adjust grievances or to investigate a specific problem to determine whether to file a grievance, the steward shall request permission from the immediate supervisor and such request shall not be unreasonably denied . . . .
> The steward, chief steward or other Union representative . . . may request and shall obtain access through the appropriate supervisor to receive the documents, files and other records necessary for processing a grievance or determining if a grievance exists and shall have the right to interview the aggrieved employee[s], supervisors and witnesses during working hours. Such requests shall not be unreasonably denied.

The contract also contains a "management rights" clause giving the Employer "the exclusive right subject to the provisions of this Agreement and consistent with applicable laws and regulations . . . [t]o direct employees of the Employer in the performance of official duties . . . [t]o maintain the efficiency of the operations entrusted to it . . . [and] to determine the methods, means and personnel by which such operations are to be conducted."

The facts of this case, no less so than those in United Technologies, make it "eminently well suited for deferral." The contract and its meaning in present circumstances lie at the heart of this dispute. The Respondent has also expressed its will-

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The Charging Party has filed a motion to strike part of the Respondent's answering brief because the brief contains references to the answer filed by the Intervenor, America Postal Workers Union, to a complaint in United States Postal Service, Case 11–CA–1195(P), currently pending before the Board. Because it is well settled that the Board may take official notice of its own proceedings and rely thereon, East Coast Equipment Corp., 229 NLRB 825, 826 (1977), we deny the Charging Party's motion.

[3] In the absence of exceptions, and noting that none of the parties has sought deferral of the 8(a)(1) allegation, we find it unnecessary to consider whether the allegation could have been deferred, if a proper and timely request for deferral had been made.

ingness to arbitrate the matter.[4] In these circumstances, we find that the dispute falls squarely within the pronouncement of United Technologies that complaint allegations should be deferred when it is established that the parties' collective-bargaining agreement contains a broad grievance-arbitration provision clearly encompassing the unfair labor practice allegations. We shall therefore order that the unfair labor practice allegations concerning the Respondent's policy restricting the time for union representatives to process grievances be deferred to the parties' grievance-arbitration procedure. As in United Technologies, however, we shall retain jurisdiction over these allegations for the purposes of entertaining a motion for further consideration on a showing that either (a) they have not been resolved through the grievance-arbitration procedure or submitted to arbitration, or (b) the grievance procedure has not been fair and regular or has reached a result that is repugnant to the Act.[5]

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

We adopt the administrative law judge's conclusions of law, with the following modification.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, United States Postal Service, Bel Air, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Substitute the following for the final unnumbered paragraph.

"The complaint allegations not specifically found herein are dismissed, provided that: Jurisdiction over these proceedings is retained for the limited purpose of entertaining an appropriate and timely motion for further consideration upon a proper showing that either (a) the dispute has not, with reasonable promptness, been resolved by amicable settlement in the grievance procedure or submitted promptly to arbitration, or (b) the grievance or arbitration procedures have not been fair and regular or have reached a result which is repugnant to the Act."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARY ELLEN R. BENARD, Administrative Law Judge. The original charge in this case was filed on March 17, 1983,[1] and amended on April 4, by American Postal Workers Union, Baltimore (Stu Filbey) Area Local, AFL–CIO (the Union) against United States Postal Service (Respondent). On April 22 the complaint was issued alleging, in substance, that Respondent restricted the time alloted to stewards of the Union for the purpose of conducting union business without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain about the matter and thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act and that Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening to suspend employees in response to their protest of this unilateral change. Respondent filed an answer in which it denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

A hearing was held before me at Baltimore, Maryland, on June 22. Following the hearing the General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs, which have been considered.

On the entire record in the case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Pursuant to the Postal Reorganization Act, 39 U.S.C. § 1209(a),[2] Respondent's operations are subject to the Board's jurisdiction over unfair labor practices. Accordingly, I find, as the complaint alleges and the answer admits, that Respondent is subject to the Board's jurisdiction in this proceeding.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

It is undisputed that, for some period of time not specified in this record, Respondent has recognized the American Postal Workers Union, AFL–CIO (the National Union) as the representative for separate nationwide units of maintenance employees, special delivery messengers, motor vehicle employees, and postal clerks. Respondent also recognizes other labor organizations as representatives of certain other classifications of employees in nationwide units; specifically, Respondent recog-

[4] The judge found the Respondent's deferral contention to be without merit because the record did not establish that the issues in this case were fully considered in the course of processing a pending grievance. We note, however, that the deferral policy stated in United Technologies does not preclude the Union from filing a second grievance specifically covering the subject matter of this unfair labor practice charge. Thus, the Respondent must waive any timeliness provisions of the grievance-arbitration clauses of the collective-bargaining agreement so that the Union's grievance may be processed in accordance with the following Order.

[5] Because we find deferral appropriate for resolution of the 8(a)(5) allegations, we find it unnecessary to pass on the other contentions related to those allegations that were raised before and considered by the judge.

[1] All dates herein are in 1983 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] That section provides: "Employee-Management Relations shall, to the extent not inconsistent with provisions of this title, be subject to the provisions of sub-chapter II of chapter 7 of title 29."

nizes the National Association of Letter Carriers (the Letter Carriers) as the representative of city letter carriers, and recognizes the National Association of Rural Carriers as the representative for rural letter carriers.[3]

The current collective-bargaining agreement, referred to in the record as the National Agreement, between Respondent and both the Letter Carriers and the National Union is in effect from July 21, 1981, to July 20, 1984, and applies nationwide. The contract includes a detailed grievance procedure which, in essence, provides for four steps prior to arbitration: At step 1 the aggrieved employee, accompanied and represented by a steward if the employee so desires, discusses the grievance with the immediate supervisor, who has authority to settle the grievance; if no resolution is reached at step 1 the grievance proceeds to step 2, at which the Union completes a standard grievance form to be filed with the installation head or other appropriate official; if no agreement is reached at that step, the grievance may be appealed in writing at step 3 to the Regional Director for Employee and Labor Relations; the grievant is at that stage represented by a Regional Representative of either the Letter Carriers or the National Union. The Union may appeal an adverse step 3 decision directly to arbitration at the Regional level if the Respondent's step 3 representative states in his or her decision that no interpretive issue under the National Agreement or supplement thereto which may be of general application is involved in the case; if such an issue is involved, the grievance may be appealed to step 4, the national level of the grievance procedure. The contract also provides that, "when it is necessary for a steward to leave his/her work area to investigate and adjust grievances or to investigate a specific problem to determine whether to file a grievance, the steward shall request permission from the immediate supervisor and such request shall not be unreasonably denied." Finally, insofar as is pertinent to this case, the contract provides for bargaining on a local level with respect to 22 specific items, primarily involving vacation schedules, procedures for reserving light duty assignments, the method of selecting employees to work on a holiday, assignment of employee parking spaces, local implementation of the contract with respect to seniority, reassignment and posting, washup periods, and whether days off would be fixed or rotating.

[3] In Postal Service, 208 NLRB 948 (1974), the petitioners sought to represent employees in separate bargaining units in various geographical locations of Respondent. The Board dismissed all the petitions on grounds that "any less-than-nationwide unit which does not at least encompass all employees within a district or sectional center is too fragmented for meaningful collective bargaining." (208 NLRB at 954.) However, the Board noted that its decision was "not to be construed as an administrative fiat to adhere to the preexisting national craft units which Congress, under the PRA [Postal Reorganization Act], continued during the transition period or as precluding a finding of unit appropriateness for a unit less than national in scope." (Ibid.) There have been no subsequent cases, at least of which I am aware, in which the Board has determined that a petitioned-for unit other than the national units reflected in the current collective-bargaining agreement is appropriate. Respondent concedes, and I thus find, that Respondent is obligated to bargain with the National Union for a nationwide unit of postal clerks.

B. The Alleged Unilateral Change and Threat of Suspension

1. The meeting on March 10

The Bel Air, Maryland post office, the only facility involved in this case, employs some 51 employees who are covered by collective-bargaining agreements. The 16 distribution clerks are included in the national unit of postal clerks represented by the National Union and their grievances on the local level are handled by Robert Ripoli, steward for the Union. The clerks are generally supervised by Robert Androsky, the supervisor of mails and delivery, but they are sometimes also supervised, especially when Androsky is not at the facility, by Kenneth Slagle, the superintendent of postal operations.

It is undisputed that during the morning of March 10 there was a meeting at the office of Mark Plakatoris, postmaster of the Bel Air Post Office. Present were Plakatoris, who called the meeting, Slagle, Acting Supervisor John Vitak, Ripoli, Michael Kennedy, alternate steward for the Union, and representatives from the Letter Carriers and the National Association of Rural Carriers. According to Slagle,[4] Plakatoris said that from then on the letter carriers and the rural carriers would conduct their union business from the time they returned from delivering mail until the end of their tour and that the Union's representative would conduct its business from 12:10 to 12:30 p.m.

Slagle further testified that the rural carriers' steward raised the question of whether even in an emergency situation the steward would have to wait until the allotted time to file a grievance and Plakatoris responded that the policy did not apply to emergencies and that in that situation the matter would be resolved immediately, but that was the only exception to the new rule.[5]

According to Ripoli and Kennedy, both of whom I credit on this point,[6] after Plakatoris made his announcement Ripoli said that he thought the new policy was a violation of the contract and an unfair labor practice, and Plakatoris replied that he was the postmaster and [4] Slagle, who was an adverse witness for the General Counsel, was the most credible witness in this proceeding, for he testified in a straightforward and candid manner and appeared to generally exhibit a good recollection. Kennedy, who also testified for the General Counsel, also generally seemed to be a credible witness but did not impress me quite as favorably as did Slagle. Although Ripoli and Plakatoris also testified as to what occurred at this meeting, I do not find either of these witnesses as credible as Slagle or Kennedy. Ripoli tended to give evasive and unresponsive answers to questions, and much of his testimony appeared to be shaded in favor of his own position. Plakatoris' testimony was also at times unresponsive. Consequently, the account of what occurred at the March 10 meeting is based on a composite of the credible testimony of Slagle and Kennedy and on the testimony of Ripoli and Plakatoris where their testimony is not inconsistent with that of the other two witnesses.

[5] Kennedy testified that he did not remember such an exchange. I credit Slagle.

[6] With respect to this credibility determination and others involved in this case, it is worth repeating here the often-quoted maxim that "[i]t is no reason for refusing to accept everything that a witness says, because you do not believe all of it; nothing is more common in all kinds of judicial decisions than to believe some and not all. NLRB v. Universal Camera Corp., 179 F.2d 749, 754 (2d Cir. 1950).

that was his policy.[7] Ripoli responded that in that case he would not be a part of the meeting and that he was leaving the office, and Plakatoris then said that if anyone left he would suspend them. Ripoli said that if Plakatoris changed his attitude and tone of voice the union representatives would stay but that they had to have some input and Plakatoris replied by saying that the meeting was over and everyone should go back to work. The entire meeting lasted about 15 minutes.[8]

2. The past policy with respect to time afforded to union representatives to conduct union business

Ripoli, Kennedy, and Slagle all testified that the preferential mail was usually out by 8:30 or 9 a.m. and that after that the clerks were free to discuss union business at any time with the permission of a supervisor. Plakatoris testified that he was not aware of any prior policy that grievances would not be discussed prior to 8:30 a.m. I find it unneccessary to make a finding regarding Plakatoris' credibility on this point, for, in any event, whether Plakatoris was aware of this policy or not,[9] I credit the testimony of Slagle, Ripoli, and Kennedy, that it existed.

3. The implementation of the new policy

It is undisputed that many of the clerks, including Ripoli, work from 4 a.m. to 12:30 p.m., 5 days out of 7. The end of the letter carriers' shift is at 3:30 p.m., and most of them return to the post office from their deliveries at 3:10 or 3:15; consequently, under the new policy, they, like the clerks, would have 15 to 20 minutes to process grievances each workday.

Slagle credibly testified that the policy as of March 10 was that the Union would be limited to interviewing its witnesses and reviewing documents and so on to the 12:10 to 12:30 p.m. period, and that although he did not recall whether Plakatoris specifically stated that the limitation applied to both union business and filing grievances with management, it was his impression that Plakatoris meant the limitation to apply to both. However, it is clear that Plakatoris did not clarify the policy at the March 10 meeting, and the record is not entirely clear as to the implementation of this policy and the consistency with which it was applied. Thus, Ripoli testified that following the March 10 meeting he was restricted to handling grievances to the time between 12:10 and 12:30 p.m. except on one occasion. However, Ripoli's testimony about this purported occasion was, at best, confused. He first testified that the one time he was permitted to continue discussing a grievance with an employee after the 12:30 p.m. deadline was on March 17, concerning a discrimination complaint by employee Charles Peaker. According to Ripoli, Peaker asked Supervisor Robert Androsky if he could talk to Ripoli and Androsky replied that he could discuss his problem between 12:15 and 12:30. Peaker and Ripoli went to the training room[10] to talk and were interrupted and told to leave at 12:30 because Ripoli was required to clock out. According to Ripoli, he and Peaker refused to leave and Ripoli was eventually paid for the amount of time he stayed overtime to talk with Peaker.[11] However, Ripoli later testified he was given extra time on the clock to write an appeal in the Peaker case. Although I credit Ripoli's testimony that he received extra time to work on grievances on each of these occasions, I obviously do not credit his testimony that there was only one time when the 20-minute limitation was not applied to him.

The record is also confused as to whether the Union was permitted only one 20-minute period to handle each grievance or whether, if a grievance could not be resolved in one session, it could be investigated or discussed further on subsequent days. Slagle credibly testified that at some time after the March 10 meeting Plakatoris told him that if 20 minutes were not enough time to resolve a matter the parties would arrange another meeting at a later date, but the initial discussion was limited to the 12:10 to 12:30 time period. Ripoli testified that on March 10 he had some union business which he could not complete between 12:10 and 12:30 and asked the acting supervisor if he could have additional time. According to Ripoli, the acting supervisor told him he would pass the request along to the supervisor, but when Ripoli asked again the next day he was told that the 12:10 to 12:30 period was a "one shot deal" and he would not get any additional time. However, Ripoli's demeanor as he gave this testimony was not impressive and I do not credit him on this point. Indeed, Ripoli further testified that on one occasion in April or May Thomas Keefe, president of the Union,[12] was supposed to come to the Bel Air Post Office to meet with Ripoli and represent him in a step 1 grievance at 10 or 10:30 a.m. but did not arrive until 12:10 or 12:15. According to Ripoli, neither he nor Keefe was wearing a watch that day, and when they received permission to go to the training room to discuss the grievance they inadvertently talked past 12:30, the end of Ripoli's tour of duty. Ripoli further testified that he and Keefe, thinking they may have talked too long, came back up stairs to reschedule another time when they could meet, and that permission was granted for him to meet again with Keefe.[13] Thus, even if Ripoli were told that he would only have one opportunity to use the twenty-minute period for each item

[7] Ripoli testified that Plakatoris said loudly that he "did not give a damn," he was the postmaster and he could do what he wanted to do, while Kennedy testified that Plakatoris got a little upset and said that he did not care, he was the postmaster and that was the policy. Slagle was not asked about this exchange. I credit Kennedy.

[8] Slagle was not asked about this exchange between Ripoli and Plakatoris. Although Plakatoris testified that he did not remember threatening Ripoli with suspension, he conceded that he may have done so, and that "the thing that flashed in my brain at that point, now what do you do. This is not a negotiation meeting where the Union could walk out. This is a case of calling my employees in; those who represent the Union and just stat[ing] my policy."

[9] I note that Plakatoris normally does not arrive at the post office until a few minutes before 8:30 a.m.

[10] This room is apparently downstairs from the work floor and is used by all the unions who represent employees in the Bel Air Post Office.

[11] Ripoli could not recall how much time was involved.

[12] Since both Keefe's and Plakatoris' last names are spelled various ways in the transcript and by the parties, I have taken the spelling of both names from a memo prepared by Plakatoris regarding a grievance filed by Ripoli and which is in evidence.

[13] However, the supervisor told him that the 12 minutes that they ran overtime on their first meeting would be disallowed.

of union business, it is clear that this aspect of the policy was not uniformly enforced.[14]

It is undisputed that Ripoli was allowed to discuss with his supervisor minor matters that would only take a couple of minutes to resolve outside the 12:10 to 12:30 p.m. period, and that he was also permitted to make telephone calls relating to union business at any time. However, Ripoli credibly testified that he was only allowed to interview employees with respect to potential grievances during the limited period. It is also undisputed that no management official ever retracted the policy announced March 10.

4. The reasons given by Plakatoris for the March 10 announcement

Plakatoris credibly testified that a survey team from Respondent's Baltimore Sectional Center was at the Bel Air Post Office on March 7 and 8 and that the function of this team was to see if they could make suggestions on the basis of their observations which would improve the operation. Plakatoris further credibly testified that the team told him that before he arrived at the post office in the morning they had noticed Ripoli leave his work area to discuss various matters with Slagle and they wanted to know if Ripoli was a supervisor. Although these discussions were short, the team suggested that it would be a good idea to set aside a specific time each day to listen to complaints.

According to Plakatoris, in light of the survey team's comments he decided to announce a new policy about grievances both in order to follow the survey team's recommendation and to prevent unnecessary waste of time during the period when the post office employees were getting mail ready for customers. Plakatoris also testified that he did not announce the new policy to try to prevent the Union from discussing grievances, but because he thought that the new policy would "present a case of better understanding and harmony between the unions and also the operation itself." On cross-examination, however, Plakatoris testified that two reasons for the new policy were that the clerks were filing grievances at inopportune times and that they were using an unreasonable amount of time on union business.[15]

Although Plakatoris testified that there was no intention to limit grievance discussions to 20 minutes and that if a grievance needed to be discussed further a time could be assigned to do so, I find that this clarification was not announced along with the new policy. Plakatoris also testified that in the event a supervisor and a steward were discussing a grievance at precisely 12:30 and the supervisor felt that it would be productive to spend an extra few minutes on overtime in order to finish the discussion, overtime would be permitted.[16]

Plakatoris further testified that following the March 10 meeting he prepared a memo on what had occurred there. That memo was introduced into evidence and states, in pertinent part, that:

> [F]or the sake of not interrupting our operations we will listen to the initial complaint or grievance as follows:
> . . . .
> Clerk Steward: at 12:10 PM
> Also if the complaint or grievance can be resolved during this time—then the matter is over.
> If Management and Labor believe that this matter should be looked into further, appropriate manager will arrange a time on the following day to meet with the Steward.

However, Plakatoris testified that he typed this memo after the meeting "so I could keep this as a record for myself," and there is no evidence that the memo was posted or otherwise publicized to the employees or the stewards as a clarification of the announcement as made.[17] I therefore find that even if Plakatoris meant to implement a policy of discussing grievances with the Union only between 12:10 and 12:30 p.m. and did not intend to restrict the time the Union spent processing grievances or indicate that each grievance would only be discussed for a maximum of 20 minutes with management, that is not what he said and the Union was not advised of what he meant for at least 2 weeks afterwards.

C. Analysis and Conclusion

1. The parties' contentions; the issues

The complaint, as effectively amended by stipulations at the hearing, alleges that the National Union represents all postal clerks in a nationwide unit. The complaint further alleges that, by announcing and implementing a policy requiring the Union to process and file grievances within a specified 20-minute period each day without affording the Union an opportunity to negotiate about the matter, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The complaint also alleges that by threatening Ripoli with suspension because he threatened to leave the March 10 meeting, Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

With respect to the 8(a)(5) allegation, Respondent contends, in essence, that no unilateral change cognizable

[14] Kennedy also testified that as far as he could observe following March 10 management permitted only the 20-minute period to process grievances and any grievance that was not finished in that time had to be done on the steward's own time. However, it appears that from the time of the announcement of the new policy until the hearing Kennedy had very little involvement with grievance processing, and his testimony on this point did not sound candid. I therefore do not credit him with respect to this matter.

[15] It is undisputed that for approximately 5 months prior to March 1 Ripoli was off work and on workmen's compensation. According to Plakatoris, whom I credit on this point, six or seven grievances filed by the Union had reached step 2 between March 1 and June 22.

[16] Ripoli testified that he felt that under the contract he was entitled to be paid for all of the time that he spent on union business. The contract, in art. 17, sec. 4, specifies that stewards will be compensated for time actually spent in grievance handling including investigation, meetings with Respondent, and writing grievances, and that such "payment . . . will be granted at the applicable straight time rate, providing the time spent is a part of the . . . steward's . . . regular workday."

[17] It appears that the memo was sent to Thomas Keefe in the course of a step 3 discussion of a grievance filed by Ripoli concerning the failure to pay him for time he spent processing grievances off the clock at home. Plakatoris discussed Ripoli's grievance on March 25 with Keefe but it is not clear whether he gave Keefe a copy of that memo at that time.

under the Act was implemented, that if there were such a unilateral change it was justified by business considerations, that the Board should not be involved in interpreting Respondent's collective-bargaining agreement with the National Union, that, in any event, Respondent has no obligation to bargain with the Union and there is no showing that Respondent has failed to bargain with the National Union,[18] and that the issues should be deferred to the pending grievance process under the Board's decision in Dubo Mfg. Corp., 142 NLRB 431 (1963).

With respect to the alleged independent 8(a)(1) violation, Respondent contends, in substance, that the allegation should be dismissed because an employee has no right to disobey management's legitimate order during worktime when management is conveying to the employee the manner in which operations will be conducted and the contract will be implemented.

2. The deferral issue

In Dubo Mfg. Corp., supra, the Board deferred action on certain allegations which were the subject of a court-ordered arbitration pending compliance with that order, holding:

> [T]he Board has recognized existing arbitration awards, and in certain circumstances has required parties before resorting to Board processes to utilize the grievance and arbitration procedure in agreements to which they are signatory. These policy considerations are clearly applicable here where not only do the parties have available a procedure to settle the dispute, but a United States District Court has ordered them to utilize it.[19]

In the instant case, Respondent contends that the Union has already invoked the grievance procedure to resolve the dispute at issue. However, that is not entirely clear from the record. The grievance to which Respondent refers is apparently one which Ripoli filed alleging that on March 10 management refused to allow him time on the clock to investigate, discuss, or write grievances, and requesting 6 hours' pay for time spent processing a grievance off the clock. On March 25 the grievance was discussed between Plakatoris and Keefe, but it is not clear when Keefe was advised of the policy restricting grievance handling to 20 minutes at the end of the steward's tour. As noted, although the memo itself bears the handwritten notation "cc: Tom Keefe Step 3," it is not clear when Keefe received it. In these circumstances, although there was a grievance filed which was pending at the time of the hearing in the instant case, the record does not establish that the issue in this case was fully considered in the course of processing that grievance. I therefore find no merit to Respondent's contention that the instant case should be deferred under Dubo, supra.

3. The contention that the Board should not inject itself into Respondent's collective-bargaining relationship with the National Union

Respondent introduced into evidence a number of documents indicating that in other cases where charges were filed alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by making unilateral changes in the amount of time permitted to stewards to investigate grievances, various regional directors of the Board had refused to issue a complaint, on grounds that the issue presented was one of contract interpretation and/or that the limitation imposed was not unreasonable. However, of course, actions of the regional directors in declining to issue a complaint are not precedent for either me or the Board in any case where a complaint has issued and I have held a hearing on the issues raised by the pleadings. Further, I note that in at least one case, Postal Service, 263 NLRB 357 (1982), the Board has addressed the question of unilateral changes in the grievance procedure.

4. Respondent's justification for the unilateral change

As discussed above, I have found that at the March 10 meeting Plakatoris announced that henceforth the Union would be permitted to process grievances between 12:10 and 12:30 p.m., and that prior to March 10 the Union representatives were allowed to file, process and investigate grievances at any time during their tour of duty after the preferential mail was finished i.e., after 8:30 or 9 a.m.

Respondent argues that the March 10 announcement was based on business necessity, that there was no showing that it had a negative impact on grievance processing or otherwise diminished employee benefits, and that the change was the type that is within the scope of normal management prerogative to direct the work force during the workday. I disagree.

First, although Plakatoris testified that the survey team from Baltimore suggested that he set aside a time each day for the discussion of grievances, he further testified that it was his option whether to implement the recommendations of the survey team or not; consequently the survey team's suggestion, standing alone, does not justify Respondent's unilateral change in the time allotted to the Union for handling grievances. Second, the mere fact that there may have been a real or perceived need for a change in the policy did not relieve Respondent of its obligation to bargain about it.[20] Third, although Respondent correctly contends that not every unilateral change in working conditions constitutes a breach of the bargaining obligation,[21] and argues that the instant change was not shown to have had any adverse impact on grievance processing or otherwise diminish employee benefits, Ripoli credibly testified that because of the unilateral change he was required to work on processing [18] In this regard, Respondent notes that a grievance regarding the failure to pay Ripoli for time spent processing a grievance off the clock was, as of the time of the hearing in this case, at the third step of the grievance procedure and the National Union is thus involved in it. However, Respondent emphasizes, although the National Union was served with copies of the charge and complaint it did not enter an appearance at the hearing.

grievances at home.[22] Finally, although the management rights clause gives Respondent the right "[T]o direct employees of the Employer in the performance of official duties," the contract also specifically gives stewards the right to request permission to investigate and adjust grievances, "and such request shall not be unreasonably denied." I thus find that to the extent that the management rights clause might have given Respondent the right to determine when stewards could file grievances, the specific provision granting them reasonable time to attend to union business was a limitation on that management prerogative. Accordingly, I find that the March 10 announcement of a limited period each day for the stewards to handle union business constituted a unilateral change in the grievance and arbitration procedure, about which Respondent had an obligation to bargain.[23]

5. The contention that the Union is without standing to protest the change at issue

As noted above, the General Counsel concedes that the Union is not the designated representative of the employees in the Bel Air Post Office and that Respondent has no obligation to bargain with it.

In Spector Freight System, 260 NLRB 86 (1982), respondent was party to the National Master Freight Agreement, which provided that owner-operators employed by respondent would be paid rental at the rate of 13 percent of gross revenue for use of their trailers. Respondent canceled a number of trailer leases and thereafter some of the owner-operators whose leases had been canceled offered to enter into new leases for a lower rental rate than that required by the contract. Respondent told the employees to contact their union representative and declined to discuss the matter with them individually. Subsequently, a business agent for the local union informed respondent that the new proposed leases violated the contract but that he would not prevent employees from signing the leases "under protest," and respondent then executed the leases. The Board found, in agreement with the administrative law judge, that neither the international union nor the local union whose business agent had discussed the matter with respondent was the designated bargaining agent for the employees at issue, but that the bargaining representative was all locals affiliated with the international union and that these locals had authorized a national negotiating committee to act as their agent in negotiations. The administrative law judge further found that the union agents who had agreed to the new leases had no authority to negotiate modifications in the contract and that there was no evidence that the bargaining agent had agreed to those modifications. However, the Board reversed, on grounds that there was no showing that respondent failed to bargain with the designated bargaining representative and, thus, the General Counsel had not met his burden of showing that respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) by the change. As the Board said, "the General Counsel was required to show that Respondent failed to bargain and reach agreement with the designated bargaining representative before implementing changes in the terms and conditions of the contract. Similarly, an element of direct dealing with employees is the lack of consent by the designated bargaining representative to the contacts made with employees—in this case, the signing of new leases containing terms which differ from those required by the NMFA."[24]

Similarly, in Gulf-Wandes Corp., 236 NLRB 810 (1978), an international union was the certified representative of bargaining unit employees and unsuccessfully sought to have respondent recognize a local union as joint representative. Thereafter, respondent agreed to include a checkoff clause in the contract which provided that respondent had the right to approve the authorization form to be used. The forms subsequently supplied by the international union provided for the dues that were deducted to be paid to the local and respondent refused to use the form because the authorization was in favor of the local instead of the international. The Board found that respondent's refusal to use that form did not violate Section 8(a)(5), on grounds that the contract referred to the international union, the international was the bargaining representative, and therefore Respondent had the right to refuse to honor checkoff authorizations which did not require that the dues collected be remitted to the international.

In the instant case, as noted above, it is undisputed that theNational Union rather than the local Union is the designated bargainingagent for the postal clerks at the Bel Air Post Office.[25]Although Plakatoris testified that he did not discuss the new policy of when grievances could be handled with Keefe, president of the Union, before announcing the change, there is no record evidence of what discussions, if any, were held between Respondent and the National Union on this matter. In any event, the complaint does not allege that there was any refusal to bargain with the National Union, there is no evidence of such a refusal, and, even after the question was raised and discussed at the hearing, there was no motion to amend the complaint to include such an allegation. In these circumstances, I find that Spector Freight [22] Although I credit Ripoli's testimony that he had to spend some of his own time in processing grievances I do not credit his testimony as to how much time he spent. In this regard, Ripoli appeared to be evasive and his demeanor was unimpressive.

[23] Respondent further contends that the General Counsel did not establish that the March 10 announcement constituted a change cognizable under Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act because Ripoli, the General Counsel's lead witness, testified that there were severe restrictions on the time allotted to him for union activity even before March 10. However, although Ripoli testified that prior to March 10 he was denied time on the clock to handle grievances, his testimony in this regard struck me as prompted more by hostility to Respondent than by a due regard for truth, and I do not credit it. In any event, even if Ripoli was denied time to process grievances before March 10, there is no contention or evidence that Respondent ever, before that date, limited the Union's steward to handling grievances between 12:10 and 12:30 p.m. I therefore find no merit to Respondent's contention in this regard.

[25] I recognize that the National Agreement provides for certain matters to be negotiated at the local level. However, the list of these matters does not include any item relating to the grievance and arbitration procedure.

System, supra, is controlling,[26] and I thus conclude that the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. I shall therefore recommend that this allegation be dismissed.[27]

6. The alleged threat of suspension

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by Plakatoris' threat to suspend Ripoli if the latter left the March 10 meeting. As discussed above, after Plakatoris made his announcement at that meeting Ripoli said that he thought that the new policy was a violation of the contract and an unfair labor practice and then threatened to leave the meeting. At that point, Plakatoris said that anyone who left the meeting would be suspended.

Respondent contends Ripoli had no right to threaten to leave the meeting, and that Plakatoris' threat of suspension was therefore not unlawful. In support of this contention Respondent cites American Ship Building Co., 226 NLRB 788 (1976). However, in that case, a union president was ordered to do some production work and refused to obey the order. In the instant case, the meeting which Ripoli threatened to leave was a meeting about how grievances would be handled, not one about normal work which might have been in Respondent's sole control. Respondent cites no cases, and I am unaware of any, where the Board has found that an employer has the absolute right to require a union representative to remain in a meeting to discuss union business. Further, it is well established that an employee's attempts to implement the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement are protected by Section 7 of the Act, whether or not the employee's interpretation of the contract is correct or whether the employee specifically refers to a contract clause while making his complaint.[28] Accordingly, I find that Ripoli was protected in threatening to leave the meeting even though I have found above that the record in this case does not establish that the unilateral change did not constitute an unfair labor practice under the circumstances of this case. I therefore further find that by threatening to suspend Ripoli, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[29]

On the basis of the above findings of fact and the entire record in this case, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The United States Postal Service is subject to the Board's unfair labor practice jurisdiction.

2. Amerian Postal Workers Union Baltimore (Stu Filbey) Area Local, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By threatening an employee with suspension because he stated that Respondent had violated the National Agreement and committed an unfair labor practice and that he would consequently leave a meeting of management and union representatives, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. A preponderance of the credible evidence does not establish that Respondent has otherwise violated the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[30]

ORDER

The Respondent, United States Postal Service, Bel Air, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees with suspension because they protest in a meeting to discuss grievance-related matters that Respondent is violating the national collective-bargaining agreement and/or committing an unfair labor practice and that they will not further participate in such a meeting.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights to engage in or refrain from engaging in any or all of the activities specified in Section 7 of the Act.

[26] In Pittsburgh Postal Workers v. Postal Service, 105 LRRM 2415 (W.D.Pa. 1978), a Federal district court considered the issue of the relationship between the National Union and the locals. In that case, there had been a settlement in 1976 over a local union's grievance concerning where mail would be broken down into individual carrier routes. In 1978 Respondent announced a new procedure which the local union contended violated that settlement, and the local union brought a district court action to enforce the settlement. The court found that the provisions in the then-national agreement regarding local unions did not include the right to sue on matters concerning the national contract and that although the action was brought to enforce a local settlement agreement, it was brought under the grievance procedures in the national agreement. Accordingly, the court found that the local's claim to the right to enforce the provisions of the contract without permission of the National Union was inconsistent with the terms of the contract and that this factor, together with the facts that the local was not signatory to the contract and that there was no showing of a special grant pursuant to the National Union's constitution or bylaws, "compels the conclusion that [the local] cannot bring this action."

[27] I note that in Postal Service, 263 NLRB 357 (1982), discussed above, Respondent did not raise the defense that it was not obligated to bargain with the local union which had filed the charge. However, I also note that in that case, apparently, Respondent had, after the local union had filed an earlier unfair labor practice charge on the matter, negotiated about when stewards should be permitted to process grievances with the local union, and, thus, it would appear that in that case Respondent waived any contention that it had no obligation to bargain with the local union about the matter. In any event, I also note, with respect to that case, that the administrative law judge, affirmed by the Board, dismissed this allegation on other grounds.

[28] Firch Baking Co., 232 NLRB 772 (1977).

[29] I note that there is no evidence that when Ripoli threatened to leave the meeting he indicated that he would refuse to return to work as well. Indeed, Plakatoris credibly testified that when Ripoli said he was going to leave Plakatoris assumed that he was going back to work.

[30] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Clare Community Hospital and Michigan Nurses Association, Petitioner. Case 7–RC–16921

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

The National Labor Relations Board has considered objections to an election[1] held 27 May 1983 and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, and adopts the hearing officer's findings and recommendations,[2] as modified herein.

By letter on 4 May 1983 the nursing staff of Clare Community Hospital was notified of the creation of a Communications Task Force comprised of two supervisory RNs, the purpose of which was "to improve communication between Nursing and Administration and your supervisory staff" and "to assist your supervisors in assuring that you have access to the facts regarding the Michigan Nurses Association union and have answers to your questions." Shortly thereafter, prior to the election, the Task Force sent a letter to the staff listing eight questions which had been asked by the nurses, and the respective answers. The subjects treated in this undated letter covered (1) the completion date for the nursing policies and procedures manual; (2) the procedure for seeing one's personnel file; (3) whether the Task Force would continue after the election; (4) a description of the existing procedure for filing a grievance; (5) an update on an ongoing study of ways to improve the pension plan; (6) a description of the existing policy on vacation requests; (7) backup support for the intensive care and obstetrics units; and (8) Code Team assignments. The letter concluded with some general information on past improvements at the hospital, and a statement that there will always be problems, but that they can be solved by "working together as a team" and "without third party intervention."

After the election the Union filed objections, and a hearing was subsequently held thereon. Objection 4 alleges that the undated letter sent by the Task Force "contained the promise of benefit and reference to the union election." The hearing officer determined that the Task Force was set up in direct response to the employees' efforts to organize and to improve communication with the employees. Without stating his specific reasons, the hearing officer further found that, in sending the letters to the staff, the Employer solicited grievances and impliedly promised to remedy them, thereby engaging in objectionable conduct. The hearing officer added, however, that even if the employer was simply answering employee questions and had a procedure for filing grievances prior to the organizing drive, that the formation of the Task Force itself represented a "radical alteration" of its method of communication; this alteration constituted a grant of a new benefit, and therefore provided an alternative basis for setting aside the election. The Employer excepts to this finding, and we find merit in its exceptions.

The Board has long held that the solicitation of employee grievances during an organizational campaign interferes with an election, as such conduct carries with it an inference that the employer is implicitly promising to remedy the grievances, thereby mitigating the employees perceived need for union representation. Reliance Electric Co., 191 NLRB 44 (1971). It is not the solicitation of grievances itself, however, that is objectionable, but the implied promise to correct them. Uarco Inc., 216 NLRB 1 (1974). An exception to this rule is recognized where the employer has had a past policy and practice of soliciting employee grievances. In such circumstances, the employer may continue the practice during the organizing drive, but may not significantly alter its past manner and method of solicitation. Carbonneau Industries, 228 NLRB 597 (1977).

In the case before us, we find no solicitation of grievances, no promise of benefits, and no significant alteration in a past method of communication. Of the eight questions answered in the undated letter to the staff from the Task Force, the hearing officer found only one to be objectionable, and that dealt with the completion date for the nursing policies and procedures manual. The hearing officer

[1] The election was held 27 May 1983 pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election. The tally was 12 votes for, and 22 votes against, the Petitioner; there were 4 challenged ballots, a number insufficient to affect the results.

The Chairman and Member Hunter honor the parties' stipulation as to the appropriateness of the unit in this health care facility and note that they generally will accept unit stipulations in the health care field. In so doing, they recognize that acceptance of parties' unit stipulations fosters the statutory policy of encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining, permits the expeditious resolution of questions concerning representation, and is consistent with Congress' concern that disruptions in health care institutions caused by initial organization activities be minimized. They also recognize, however, that a stipulated unit may so substantially contravene the congressional admonition to avoid undue proliferation of units as to increase significantly the likelihood of disruption of health care. Furthermore, there may be situations when the stipulation is derived from the mere convenience of the parties to the detriment of important rights and interests of the employees, or situations where the stipulation is otherwise contrary to the policies of the Act. In all such circumstances, the Chairman and Member Hunter will decline to honor the parties' stipulation since the public interest must outweigh the convenience of the private parties involved.

[2] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt pro forma the hearing officer's recommendations to overrule Objections 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, and 7, and to approve withdrawal of Objection 8.

apparently viewed the inclusion of a target date for completion of the manual as the promise of a benefit. The testimony and the record evidence, however, indicate that this project had been in the works for some time, well before the filing of the petition. The mere inclusion of a completion date (which the hearing officer erroneously noted as being before the election) does not constitute a "benefit" sufficient to interfere with the employees' free choice.

Second, the evidence indicates that the Employer is a small hospital where people regularly change roles. The two supervisory RNs on the Task Force and others had participated in discussions of staff concerns in the past. Thus the "official" creation of the Task Force is not such a significant alteration in the method of communication so as to be perceived as a new "benefit" by the staff. Consequently, given the hearing officer's recommendation to overrule the Petitioner's other objections, the fact that he found the rest of the undated letter unobjectionable, and the absence of any other objectionable conduct on the part of the Employer, we will overrule Objection 4 and certify the results of the election.

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for the Michigan Nurses Association and that it is not the exclusive representative of these bargaining unit employees.

MEMBER DENNIS, dissenting.

I would overturn the election. During the critical period, and in direct response to the Union's campaign, the Employer created a new, permanent, structured organization designed to improve communication between management and employees. I agree with the hearing officer that "the Employer radically altered and attempted to improve its method of communication with employees, thereby conferring a benefit upon them not previously enjoyed."

The Employer's president John MacLeod told employees in his 4 May 1983 letter that "[a]s a result of the union interest" among nurses "it has become apparent that there is a breakdown in communication." He announced that the board of directors had therefore formed "a special, high-level 'Communications Task Force'" to correct the problem. MacLeod stated that the supervisory Task Force members Crafard and Vieau were available to provide immediate assistance, and invited employees to telephone or page them. Later, in an undated letter issued before the election, Crafard and Vieau identified "questions and concerns" the employees had raised. Their letter promised the Task Force would continue after the election "on a permanent basis" and would include nonsupervisory personnel.

My colleagues conclude that, because Crafard and Vieau had informally discussed employee concerns in the past, the Task Force would not be perceived as a benefit. I disagree. The Employer for the first time established a permanent committee to air and adjust grievances through formalized cooperation between management and employees. The Employer emphasized its significant departure from past practice in letters to employees describing the Task Force, and the evidence confirms the Employer's representations. Because the Task Force was a significant new benefit, which the Employer admittedly instituted "[a]s a result of the union interest," I would order a new election.[1]

[1] In reaching this conclusion, I stress the structured, formal, and permanent nature of the Task Force. I would not ordinarily find an employer's generalized expressions of a desire for "better communications" to be a promise or grant of benefit.

5 February 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 22 December 1983 Administrative Law Judge James S. Jenson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed briefs in support of the judge's decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Union had not waived the employees' right to participate in a sympathy strike and, therefore, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by suspending eight employees because they refused to cross a stranger picket line. For the following reasons we find the parties' contract permitted the discipline, and consequently we reverse the judge's decision and dismiss the complaint.

On 21 May 1982[3] the Respondent began laying cable and installing poles and street lights on a municipal building complex in Flagstaff, Arizona. On 28 July Construction Supervisor Herring ordered a 10-man crew to remove intersecting overhead lines on the project to make way for a large crane. Because a Carpenters Union picket line crossed the access road to the overhead lines,[4] eight crewmembers refused to perform work. Herring warned the eight employees they could be disciplined and told them to return to the office. That afternoon Herring suspended the sympathy strikers for 5 days. In response to IBEW business agent Stanfield's request on 28 July, the Carpenters Union agreed to remove its pickets. The Respondent's crew reported to work the next day. Herring told the sympathy strikers he thought the Respondent had lifted the 5-day suspensions because they were willing to work, but he thought they still would be disciplined.

On 29 July the Respondent advised that it might bring suit against the Union because of the employees' refusal to perform assigned work. By letter dated 29 July the Union answered that it had not authorized the "stoppage, strike, slowdown or suspension of work at the Flagstaff City Complex." On 2 August the Respondent suspended the eight employees for 3 days, informing them that their work stoppage violated article I, section 2 of the contract.

Article I, section 2, of the agreement provides:

> During the term of this Agreement, and during any period of time while negotiations are in progress between the parties hereto for the extension or renewal of this Agreement, the Union agrees on behalf of itself and each of its members that there will be no authorized concerted failure to report to work, cessation or interruption of work, slowdown, strike, boycott, or otherwise, with the Company's business.
> The Company agrees, as part of the consideration of this Agreement, that neither the Union, its officers, representatives, or members shall be liable for damages for unauthorized stoppages, strikes, intentional slowdowns, or suspensions of work in the Company's service, if:
> (a) The Union gives written notice to the Company within twenty-four (24) hours of such action that it has not authorized the stoppage, strike, slowdown, or suspension of work;
> (b) Copies of the notice described in (a) above are posted immediately by the Union on the bulletin board;
> (c) The Union further cooperates with the Company in getting the employees to return and remain at work.
> It is recognized that the Company has the right to take disciplinary action, including discharge, against any employees who engage in any unauthorized stoppage, strike, intentional slowdown, or suspension of work, subject to the Union's right to present a grievance on such discipline in accordance with Article VII of this Agreement in cases in which an issue of fact exists as to whether or not any particular employee has engaged in, participated in, or encouraged any such violation.

[1] The Respondent excepts to the judge's rejection of an affidavit the Respondent submitted after the hearing and has submitted an additional affidavit. We strike the Respondent's posthearing documentary submissions, as they are neither newly discovered nor were they unavailable at the time of the hearing. We have considered court decisions that the Respondent called to our attention.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] All dates are in 1982.

[4] Several unions had been picketing the project for some time without impeding the Respondent's work.

The article permits the Respondent to discipline employees who "engage in any unauthorized stoppage, strike, intentional slowdown, or suspension of work." The Union's 29 July letter states that it "has not authorized the stoppage, strike, slowdown or suspension of work" at the Flagstaff jobsite. Thus, by the terms of the parties' contract, and consistent with the Union's letter, the Respondent "has the right to take disciplinary action" against the eight employees.[5] Accordingly, we find that the Respondent did not violate the Act by suspending the eight employees for 3 days.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[5] In Indianapolis Power & Light Co., 273 NLRB 1716 (1985), we stated that we agree with former Member Penello's dissent in Operating Engineers Local 18 (Davis-McKee), 238 NLRB 652 (1978), to the effect that, absent extrinsic evidence that parties intended otherwise, a general no-strike clause waives the employees' right to engage in sympathy strikes. Accordingly, to the extent that the cases the judge relies on are inconsistent with our holding in Indianapolis Power & Light, they were overruled in that case.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES S. JENSON, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard in Phoenix, Arizona, on February 8, 9, 10, and 11, 1983, pursuant to a charge filed on August 20, 1982,[1] and a complaint issued on October 4. The complaint alleges the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by issuing 3-day suspensions to eight employees for having engaged in a sympathy strike and refusal to cross the picket line of the Carpenters Union at a municipal building project for the city of Flagstaff, Arizona. The principal issue was whether the Charging Union waived the Section 7 right of the Respondent's employees to engage in sympathy strikes and honor the picket lines of other unions at sites where Respondent's employees have been scheduled to work.

All parties were given full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, examine, and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs were filed by all three parties and have been carefully considered.

Both the General Counsel and Respondent filed motions to correct the record. The motions are granted and have been added to the formal exhibit file as General Counsel's Exhibits 1(i) and (j), respectively.

On March 14, 1983, the time for filing briefs in this matter was "extended to all parties to the close of business April 1, 1983." The Respondent's brief was hand delivered by special messenger to a Federal building security guard at 5:40 p.m. on the due date, this office having closed at 5 p.m. Respondent's brief, therefore, was on my desk Monday morning, April 4. The General Counsel's brief, which is dated March 31, was apparently sent by certified mail, and was not received until the afternoon of April 4. Thus, both the Respondent's and the General Counsel's briefs, from a technical standpoint, were received after the "close of business April 1, 1983," and were therefore late. It is clear, however, that no party has suffered any prejudice because of the late filings by both parties. Accordingly, the General Counsel's motion to strike the Respondent's brief is denied.

The Respondent's brief contains two attachments, a decision of the Supreme Court of Arizona, and an affidavit from an employee who did not testify. Respondent's brief also contains several requests treated herein as motions. Respondent requests that the General Counsel be ordered to provide it "with copies of any and all statements in the Government's possession, from individuals other than the General Counsel's witnesses who testified at the hearing, dealing with matters to which these witnesses testified"; that "in the event that [Respondent] determines that, as a result of any such statements, additional testimony or other evidence should be provided, the hearing be reopened"; that in the event the Government asserts that whatever other statements it has do not deal with the testimony of the witnesses, that I should review the statements "in camera or otherwise"; and that in the event the Government asserts it has no other statements which relate to matters to which its witnesses testified, Respondent is entitled to cross-examine counsel for the General Counsel under oath. On April 13, the General Counsel filed (in addition to its motion to strike Respondent's brief), a motion to strike the documentary evidence which was attached to the Respondent's brief, and opposed the Respondent's renewed motion that the General Counsel make available for its inspection statements by individuals who did not testify. The General Counsel's motion to strike the documents attached to the Respondent's brief is granted. The additional evidence which Respondent seeks to have considered is neither newly discovered nor was it unavailable at the time of the hearing. As the Board stated in Otis Elevator Co., 255 NLRB 235 at 239 (1981): "The responsibility of 'making a record' supporting one's position not only devolves upon the parties, but particularly devolves upon them during the hearing and before the record is closed." The Respondent's request with respect to the production of statements from individuals other than the General Counsel's witnesses, or that it be permitted to cross-examine the General Counsel under oath with respect to the existence of such statements, is also denied. Respondent's reliance on Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), and United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976), is completely misplaced. While a prosecutor in a criminal case has a duty to supply exculpatory material to a defendant, Respondent cites no authority suggesting that either case applies to a civil administrative proceeding. Clearly, the General Counsel was not required to supply Respondent with statements made by nonwitness employees solely because of Respondent's hope that the statements might be useful to it. See Hedison Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 643 F.2d 32 (1st Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Master Slack, 618 F.2d 6 (6th Cir. 1980); North American Rockwell Corp. v. NLRB, 618

F.2d 866 (10th Cir. 1968); Morrison-Knudson Co., 210 NLRB 174 fn. 1 (1974).

In its brief, the Respondent resubmitted a rejected offer of proof covering certain testimony of its witness Gelinas. I have reconsidered my ruling in light of the entire record, and reaffirm it.

On the entire record in the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Arizona Public Service Company (Respondent) is engaged in business as a public utility within the State of Arizona, furnishing electrical power and natural gas service to customers. During the past 12 months it derived gross revenue in excess of $250,000 and purchased goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were received directly from suppliers located in States other than Arizona. It is alleged, admitted, and found that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is alleged, admitted, and found that International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 387, AFL–CIO and Arizona State District Council of Carpenters, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO are each labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Setting

Respondent is a public utility engaged in furnishing electrical power and natural gas services to its customers. Respondent employs approximately 7000 employees, approximately 2500 of whom are in the unit represented by the Union. There has been a collective-bargaining relationship between the Respondent and the Union since about 1945, the most recent collective-bargaining agreement being effective from April 1, 1982, to April 1, 1984. Since at least 1949, each of the agreements has contained the following provisions regarding strikes and lockouts:

ARTICLE I

Reciprocal Covenants—Union Recognition

Section 1. During the term of this Agreement, and during any period of time while negotiations are in progress between the parties hereto for the extension or renewal of this Agreement, the Company that there will be no lockout.

Section 2. During the term of this Agreement, and during any period of time while negotiations are in progress between the parties hereto for the extension of renewal of this Agreement, the Union agrees on behalf of itself and each of its members that there will be no authorized concerted failure to report to work, cessation or interruption of work, slowdown, strike, boycott, or otherwise, with the Company's business.

The Company agrees, as part of the consideration of this Agreement, that neither the Union, its officers, representatives, or members shall be liable for damages for unauthorized stoppages, strikes, intentional slowdowns, or suspensions of work in the Company's service, if:

(a) The Union gives written notice to the Company within twenty-four (24) hours of such action that it has not authorized the stoppage, strike, slowdown, or suspension of work;

(b) Copies of the notice described in (a) above are posted immediately by the Union on the bulletin board;

(c) The Union further cooperates with the Company in getting the employees to return and remain at work.

It is recognized that the Company has the right to take disciplinary action, including discharge, against any employees who engage in any unauthorized stoppage, strike, intentional slowdown, or suspension of work, subject to the Union's right to present a grievance on such discipline in accordance with Article VII of this Agreement in cases in which an issue of fact exists as to whether or not any particular employee has engaged in, participated in, or encouraged any such violation.

Article VII of the current agreement is entitled "Grievances and Arbitration." The present language was adopted in 1980. It reads, in pertinent part:

Section 1. A grievance for the purpose of this Agreement shall be considered as any complaint on the part of an employee or employees regarding the treatment he receives from fellow employees, foremen, or Company representatives, dissatisfaction with working conditions, or any action on the part of the Company or Company representatives which he considers to be a breach of this Agreement. Disputes over wages and wage scales shall not be deemed a grievance. (4–1–80)

. . . .

Section 3. Any grievance which cannot be adjusted under the provisions of this Article, and any difference that may arise between the Company and the Union concerning the overall application or interpretation of this Agreement or any provisions hereof (as distinguished from its application, or grievances of individual employees or group of employees) which the representatives of the Union and the Company are unable to settle, including differences concerning amendments to this Agreement at any termination date, may be referred to arbitration. (4–1–80)

The record shows that during negotiations leading up to the 1980–1982 agreement, the Respondent proposed the following change with respect to article I, section 2: "To clarify that any strike, slowdow, boycott or other concerted activity will be a violation of this Agreement." Peter L. Joachim, Respondent's supervisor of labor relations, testified that the effect of the proposal was to change the wording to make it more clear that all strikes were prohibited. The Union rejected the proposal and it was withdrawn.

B. 1982–1984 Contract Negotiations

Respondent proposed changes in the wording of article I, section 2 again during negotiations leading up to the 1982–1984 agreement. Joseph Gelinas, vice president of employee relations, was the chairman of the Respondent's negotiating committee and its principal spokesman. Other company representatives were Industrial Relations Manager Charles Nelson, Supervisor of Labor Relations Peter Joachim, Labor Relations Analyst John Patrick,[2] Division Vice President Jerry Human, and Vice President of Power Production Walt Eckstrom. Harold Sebring, the Union's president, was chairman of the Union's negotiating committee. Other union negotiators included Union Business Manager Bowden, Assistant Business Manager Gene Hill, and Respondent's employees Bill Burke, Ken Christopher, and Bob Edwards. On February 18, a preliminary negotiation meeting was held at which time the Company and the Union exchanged their lists of proposed changes and amendments to the contract. The first proposal by the Respondent was to delete the word "unauthorized" form article I, section 2. No substantive discussion took place on February 18.

The parties met again on February 22, at which time Gelinas gave the Union "Company Proposal Number 1" consisting of a copy of article I, section 2, with the words "authorized" and "unauthorized" crossed out. The proposal states that its purpose is to "Clarify that any of the activities listed are prohibited and cannot be authorized." While there is disagreement among the witnesses as to exactly what was said between the parties, I am convinced and find from a composite of the credited testimony that Bowden asked what the proposal meant; that Gelinas stated the Company wanted to make it clear that article I, section 2, encompassed all work stoppages; that Sebring asked if the proposal would force union members to cross picket lines; that Gelinas answered in the affirmative and cited as an example a sympathy strike at the Deer Valley warehouse; that Bowden stated that he didn't see any need for the change since the Company and the Union had always worked together and been able to dispose of problems involving picket lines, citing an example in Scottsdale where he had gotten the other union to remove its picket. Contrary to the position of the Respondent, the evidence does not disclose that the Union agreed on February 22 with the Respondent's position that article I, section 2, encompassed sympathy strikes. On March 4, the evidence shows, Sebring specifically rejected Respondent's proposal to change article I, section 2.

On March 8, the Union and Respondent met again. Gelinas testified as follows:

> Q. [By Mr. Morales] Okay. Tell us what was said in connection with that proposal, with that discussion, and who said it?
> A. I believe it was in context that we wanted to get on with trying to get some issues resolved that we were going through.
> Q. And if you can recall, Mr. Gelinas, just as specifically as you can, the words that you remember yourself that anybody else said on this topic?
> A. I believe I said words: I'd like to get on with this so that we can finish up by the 1st of April and I said that based upon the comments and understanding from our last meeting when we discussed this that since the language is all-encompassing or in broad enough terms to encompass the issue of sympathy strikes, that if we can, based upon that understand, we would withdraw our proposal.
> Q. All right. What did the union representative say to that?
> A. I don't believe there was any verbal commentary at all after that.
> Q. Was Mr. Bowden at that meeting?
> A. Yes.

Joachim testified:

> Our contract date is April 1st. And so we were, you know, we had a lot of issues to discuss. And so Joe, on the 8th, started trying to wrap some things up. And he said something to the effect that, well, we want to, you know, kind of get things moving and based on the—I think somewhere in here this had come up that the union had rejected our change. They had said, "No, we're not going to do anything on that." But, anyway, Joe brought this up and he said to kind of speed things up, he said, "Based on the fact that you have assured me that you believe that this clause as it stands covers everything, covers our concerns, "I think is what he said. And I think he may had even said, sympathy strike, I believe he did. "I'm going to withdraw that proposal." And nobody said anything like, well, if that's your belief, don't withdraw it. And it was at that point withdrawn.

Bowden denied Gelinas conditioned withdrawal of company proposal one upon any purported understanding or union representation regarding the application of the clause to sympathy strikes. He further denied he ever stated that the Respondent had the right under the contract to discipline employees who engaged in a sympathy strike, or that the contract language was already broad enough to cover the matter of disciplining employees for engaging in a sympathy strike. He also denied Gelinas used the term "resolved" as the basis for the withdrawal. Bowden's testimony is corroborated in material part by Sebring, Christopher, and Edwards. The testimony of the union negotiators is credited over that of Gelinas. In this regard, it is noted that Joachim's testimony supports that of the General Counsel's witnesses that the union negotiators had rejected the Respondent's proposed change prior to the March 8 meeting, and there is no evidence to show that the subject was discussed between the time it was brought up again by Gelinas on March 8, at which time the proposal was withdrawn. Gelinas testified that at the March 22 negotiations, while recapping negotiations to that point, "I indicated company proposal number 1, resolved, was my word, and then we moved on to the next." The Union made no response. I do not find, however, that the Union's silence was consent to adoption of the Respondent's proposal which had already been specifically rejected and withdrawn by the Respondent. Also, it is clear from the record that the Respondent never proposed to modify article I, section 2, by inserting the words "sympathy strike" as a prohibited activity.

[2] Witnesses were sequestered at the commencement of the hearing pursuant to the General Counsel's motion and without objection from the Respondent. Clyde Bowden, the Union's business manager, and a rebuttal witness, was selected by the General Counsel to remain in the hearing room and assist him. The Respondent was initially permitted two representatives, Duffey, who was not a witness, and Supervisor of Construction Richard Herring, who testified. Joachim was permitted to sit at Respondent counsel's table after one of the other men left. The parties were instructed to police the sequestration rule themselves, since I did not know who would be called to testify. Patrick, who had taken notes on behalf of the Company during all of the contract negotiations, was permitted to remain in the hearing room and was observed taking notes throughout the hearing. In violation of the sequestration rule, the Respondent called Patrick as a witness on surrebuttal. Pursuant to the General Counsel's objection, I did not permit Patrick to testify. I have reconsidered my ruling in the light of the entire record, and reaffirm it. I also reaffirm my ruling rejecting R. Exh. 8, which consists of Patrick's notes taken during negotiations and which were also offered during surrebuttal.

On March 31, following the conclusion of negotiations, Gelinas sent Bowden the following letter:

> This letter will confirm our understandings we arrived at during our 1982 negotiations.
> (1) The administration of the Company's fringe benefits programs will remain within its sole discretion. It is understood that the company will not reduce these benefits for bargaining unit employees during the life of this agreement.
> (2) Regarding the new Article V, Section 1a, which pertains to an employee on vaction who becomes ill and is under a doctor's care substantiating his need to be absent, it is understood that the employee has the same obligation to report that illness as they now do under the current sick leave provisions of the Company.

Gelinas testified the items included in the above letter "were the ones where there may have been some area possibly of misunderstanding between the parties." He further testified that there were in fact other matters agreed upon which were not reduced to writing, including the breadth of article I, section 2.[3]

C. Past Practices

It is clear from the record that, prior to the incident giving rise to this case, no bargaining unit employee was ever disciplined by the Respondent for having engaged in a sympathy strike by refusing to cross another union's picket line to perform work for Respondent. Joachim testified he knew of no instances where bargaining unit employees ever refused a direct order to perform work for Respondent at a job location because of the existence of a picket line by another union, reciting several specific instances when unit employees in fact crossed picket lines. He testified that in 1978, a crew entered through a separate or neutral gate to hang a transformer at a Santa Fe yard. In 1979, he informed Bowden that a Carpenters Union had established a picket line on a job at the east end of Phoenix, that there was a separate gate, that Respondent was going to send a crew there to work, and that Bowden told him to go ahead. In 1980, a number of employees entered through a separate gate and performed work on a job being picketed on 19th Avenue. While Joachim testified he told the foreman to tell the men to "either go or we'll take disciplinary action," he did not know whether the foreman so informed the crew, and the record does not establish any reluctance on the part of the employees to enter the premises. In 1981, a number of employees entered the St. Joseph Hospital jobsite in Phoenix through a separate gate and performed work. Joachim also testified there were a number of occasions where various unions picketed a Del Webb construction site at Sun City, and Respondent's employees had entered when told through separate gates. While Richard Farthing, Respondent's customer service representative in Flagstaff, testified he had never encountered a situation where Respondent's employees refused to perform work because of a picket line, he had expressed concern that they would not remove the overhead line at the Flagstaff City Complex, the jobsite involved here, which was being picketed by the Carpenters Union.

Witnesses for the General Counsel testified to a number of instances when employees had declined to cross stranger picket lines to perform work for Respondent. Lineman Gary Smith testified that in August 1978,

[3] The final sentence in art. XI of the collective-bargaining agreement states that "It is distinctly understood and agreed that all previous agreements and understandings, if any, and all negotiations, whether oral or written, by and between the Company and the Union, are superseded by this Agreement."

he was on a crew assigned to put in underground lines on a project in Tempe. Upon observing pickets at the site, the men returned to the yard and were assigned to another job. No adverse action was taken against him. After the picketing ceased, the men returned and performed the work. Sebring testified that in 1970 or 1971, he was dispatched to work at O'Mally's Lumber Company in Phoenix. Upon observing pickets, he called Joachim, who was a supervisor or foreman at the time, and was told not to cross the picket line. Christopher testified that 17 or 18 years ago, he reported to a supervisor that he had declined to cross a picket line on a "meter run." No adverse action was taken. About 6 months later, he was on a crew assigned to work on an underground vault in Phoenix. Upon seeing pickets, the crew entered into a discussion among themselves. The work was not performed and no adverse action was taken against them. Edwards testified that 3 or 4 years ago he was sent to read a meter at Goettl's Metals in Phoenix. Upon observing pickets, he drove around the block and reported back to his foreman who said he would take care of it. No adverse action resulted. Bowden testified that employees refuse to work at sites where another union is picketing two or three times a year, and that he has never been informed that Respondent took any action against an employee because he engaged in a sympathy strike. The usual practice, he testified, was that he called Nelson, or Nelson called him, and "we try to get the pickets removed and have been very successful over the years really." Respondent's crews have been "pulled off" until the pickets were removed. He recited several examples. About 12 years ago he received a call from Tom Woods, Respondent's vice president of personnel, that the crew did not want to cross a picket line at a housing project near Casa Grande. Woods stated that they were going to have to go in "because their pump was out of water and that the developer had called the Corporation Commission [who] was putting pressure on the company." Bowden called the Corporation Commission and was informed it had not received any complaint. Woods response was, "Well, the hell with them then. If they're going to lie to me, just keep the guys out . . . . We won't put them back in there again." Three weeks later, after the Carpenters Union removed the picket, Respondent's crew did the work. Approximately 8 or 10 years ago, Bowden received a call that another union had placed a picket on a condominium development in Scottsdale. Bowden called Chuck Ammerman, Respondent's then manager of industrial relations, and the two went to the project and talked to the developer. Ammerman arranged to have the crew work on Saturday when the nonunion workers would not be working and there would be no pickets. No adverse action against the Union's members resulted. Approximately 8 or 9 years ago in Paradise Valley, a crew refused to cross a Carpenters Union picket line. No disciplinary action was taken. Approximately 4 or 5 years ago, the Union and the Respondent agreed that a crew would not be required to cross another union's picket line. The required work was performed by nonbargaining unit employees. No disciplinary action resulted. Bowden testified that during construction of the Four Corners Power Plant in the early 1970's, various building trades unions picketed at the bridge crossing the San Juan River, which was several miles from, but the only practical employee access to, the plant. According to Bowden, he told union representatives, including stewards, that the employees "have a right not to cross that picket line," but that he felt the Company would terminate them, but that at a primary gate, "depending on the urgency or criticalness of the job maybe, of being reinstated if you were terminated or permanently replaced, or you will take the shoes of a striker. On the secondary gate, I think your chances are somewhat less than at the primary gate." He denied he ever told anyone that the contract prohibited them from honoring a picket line, or that they could be discharged under the contract for honoring another union's picket line. Bill Walker, now a planning supervisor and a witness for the Respondent, was a union steward during the construction of the Four Corners Power Plant. He testified that when Respondent's employees expressed concern about crossing the picket line, "I told them if they crossed the pickets that they were subject to disciplinary action."[4] (Emphasis added.) His response, he claimed, was based on conversations with Bowden. Regarding the conversations with Bowden, he testified, "Well, in talking to Clyde [Bowden] about this, he told me that if you didn't cross the picket lines and if they weren't for 387 that you were subject to disciplinary action. The only way that you may not get disciplinary action would be if you was afraid of bodily—being hurt when you came across the picket line, somebody throwing rocks at you or whatever." As is readily seen, what Walker claims he told employees, which he claims was based upon what Bowden told him, is ambiguous. This leads me to conclude that his understanding and/or recollection is not accurate. Accordingly, I credit Bowden's testimony over his.

D. The Flagstaff Job

Construction of a new municipal building complex (City Complex) for the city of Flagstaff, Arizona was begun in early 1982. The City Complex was located in the east half of a four-block tract bordered on the north by Birch, on the south by Santa Fe, on the west by Sitgreaves, and on the east by Humphreys Streets. Kendricks bisects the tract in a north-south direction, and Aspen in an east-west direction. At all times material herein, Aspen was torn up and impassable because of construction materials piled in its path between Humphreys to the east and Kendricks to the west. Kendricks was also impassable and scheduled for abandonment between Aspen on the north and Santa Fe on the south. Thus, the area encompassing the new City Complex was bounded by Birch on the north, Humphreys on the east, Santa Fe on the south, and Kendricks to the west. Located a few feet west and paralleling Kendricks is located a drywash or ditch 10 to 15 feet wide and 8 to 10 feet deep which contains the Rio De Flagg River bed. Access to the City Complex from the west is through a gate (west gate) located near the intersection of Aspen and Kendricks just east of the bridge crossing the ditch. There is also an access road from the east located near the northeast corner of Humphreys and Birch. Paralleling and located along the entire eastern side of Kendricks was an overhead power line (north-south power line). There was also an overhead power line running east and west which was located south of the building site. As will be seen hereafter, removal of the two overhead power lines at a time when Carpenters Union pickets were located at the west gate precipitated a sympathy strike and refusal to perform work by several men on Respondent's crew assigned to remove them.

Work begun at the city Complex on May 21. Respondent's crews worked for 12 consecutive days laying underground cable in open trenches and installing switching cabinets. Thereafter, the crews worked sporadically on completing the cable laying and working on street lights and transition poles around the perimeter. While the date of the commencement of picketing at the west gate was not established, picketing by one or another of the various construction trades unions was going on in July while Respondent's crewmembers were working at the premises. The target of the picketing appears to have been J. R. Porter Company, one of the building contractors.

By mid-July, construction work had progressed on the building complex to the point it was felt it was necessary for safety reasons to deenergize and remove the north-south overhead power line in order that a large crane could be used for steel erection in the proximity of the overhead line. Concern had been expressed regarding the possibility that the crane might come in contact with the overhead line. Consequently, Herring, Respondent's supervisor of construction, was advised by the project manager that unless the overhead lines were removed, steel erection would be stopped, resulting in financial hardship for the city, J. R. Porter Company, and the steel erectors. Consequently, Farthing, Respondent's customer relations representative in Flagstaff, asked the Respondent's construction foreman to schedule the work for the following week. Farthing also informed his superior, Jim Spencer, that he did not know if the crew would remove the overhead lines because of the pickets. Herring had been informed by the Flagstaff city manager that there had been no picket line violence and that the city would provide necessary security for Respondent's crew. Herring testified he was concerned about reports of violence by Carpenters' pickets at other jobsites. He therefore called Joachim for the purpose of having Joachim contact the Union so there would not be any problem connected with the job. Joachim testified that Vince Cardinal of the District Council of Carpenters had informed him that he did not think there would be any problem.

Sometime during the morning on Monday, July 26, Union Steward Bruce Osborne went to Herring's office and said he had to see another steward, Jerry Murphy, and that they had to check into the City Complex job, apparently to talk to the Carpenters Union business agent. Herring made a company car available to them and told them to take the time they needed. They reported back to Herring about 2 p.m. that they had not seen the business agent but that they had driven by the picket line and told the pickets that they planned to work there the next day. According to Herring, they were told by the pickets, "If you come out here, we'll have 600 pickets here tomorrow."

Later that afternoon, Herring called a meeting of the linemen crews in Flagstaff, at which time he told them what work had to be done at the City Complex and that the city was putting pressure on to have the overhead lines removed immediately. Herring stated he was aware of the pickets and that the Union's stewards were going to talk to the Carpenters' business agent the next day and try to make peace with him. Several employees expressed reservations about working on the project because of union considerations and for fear of harm to themselves and their families.[5] Herring told them the city manager had tried to reassure him there had been no threat of violence at the job. Proposals to avoid working in the vicinity of the pickets were also suggested by several of the linemen and were rejected by Herring as impractical. According to Herring, he gave the men the option of one crew working all week, or all three crews working together to get the work done more quickly. The men chose to all work at once.

On Tuesday, July 27, Herring again provided Osborne and Murphy with a car so that they could talk to the Carpenters' business agent. Upon their return they reported that the Carpenters' representative said there would be no problem. In the meantime, Herring had called the Carpenters' representative and was advised that he had already talked to the stewards and there would not be any problem. Murphy also informed Herring that he did not trust the Carpenters' representative and that there would be a decision making meeting that night among the union members. Stanfield also attended the meeting. He testified he told the men that he "was not there to tell them to cross a picket line and go to work, or to refuse to cross the picket lines and not work. That I was merely there to explain the law to them as best I understood it. . . . I told the employees that I thought that if the Company offered the first gate to them, the primary gate and they refused, that the Company may replace them, or terminate them. And I said there was recourse there. I said if they offer the second gate to you, the one on the east side of the project and you refuse it, I said they may terminate you then and I don't believe we have any recourse." Osborne told the men that the Carpenters' representative had said there would be no problem with Respondent's crew working behind the picket line.

A safety meeting was held with the employees scheduled to work on the City Complex at 7 a.m. on July 28. About 8 a.m., they left for the jobsite. Jack Kelly, the foreman assigned to direct removal of the overhead lines, arrived first, parked his truck in an open lot near the southeast corner of Santa Fe and Kendricks, and proceeded to prepare for holding a "tailboard," a meeting to discuss the work and assign the men to certain tasks.

[5] Rumors had circulated regarding an underground cable that had been cut at the site and rock throwing incidents at another project where the Carpenters Union picketed.

Kelly observed approximately 8 to 10 pickets at the west gate which was located approximately a block north and a little to the east of his truck. It is undisputed that the pickets were located almost directly under the north-south overhead line which was scheduled for removal. The crew, consisting of Ross Thompson, Ed Wilson, Clifford Miles, Jerry Nelson, Bill Smith, Gary Smith, Mark Finfrock, Dale Hudson, Marvin Harper, and Nap Birner parked their trucks near Kelly's, and gathered around him. Upon seeing the pickets, several of the men informed Kelly that they would not cross the picket line. According to Gary Smith, Kelly responded that there was not any use in having a "tailboard" then, and told those that were not going to work to go over on the street so he could tell who was willing to work. Accordingly the crew, except for Thompson, Wilson, and Birner, congregated near an old hotel building located about 75 feet away at the intersection at Santa Fe and Kendricks. However, when Kelly told Wilson and Birner what work he wanted done, they joined the other men at the old hotel building.

In the meantime, Stanfield went to the jobsite about 7 a.m. and talked to the Carpenters Union business representative, Burt, who informed him that he did not think it was possible to have the picket line removed unless such a decision was made by that union's legal counsel. Burt also said he had already informed Herring and the Union's stewards that there would not be any problem with Respondent's employees crossing the picket line. One of the pickets told Stanfield of an incident involving a man who had appeared at the picket line with a gun and then driven off. Stanfield then drove to a point near the east gate of the project, parked on Humphreys, and waited for the men to arrive. When he saw the crews drive pass on Santa Fe, he walked south around the perimeter of the project to the old hotel building where the crewmembers were congregated. Herring also arrived at the project about this time. Noticing that work had not begun and that the men had congregated near the old hotel, he walked over to that area and asked why they were not working. Murphy responded that there was a picket line and that he did not want to work "for moral reasons and fear of my life, too," and that he would work any place else. According to Smith, Nelson told Herring that "we're fearful for harm for our families and us. Also, we're good union men, we don't want to cross their picket line. Also the job that has to be done we'll be working right over those men." Herring told the men they were engaging in a work stoppage, that their refusal to work was insubordination that could result in discipline, that the City Complex work was the only assignment for the day, and that, if they refused to work, they should report back to the office for individual meetings. After a short time Kelly returned to the group and was told that the men elected to return to the yard.

Upon returning to the yard, each of the linemen was interviewed by Herring and Spencer in Herring's office. Stanfield was also present during the interviews except for those with Thompson and Wilson. Herring asked each employee if he realized he was involved in a work stoppage, if he realized the City Complex work was the job assignment for the day, why he was refusing to work, and whether he understood he could be disciplined for his action. All of the linemen, with the exception of Thompson and Wilson, declined to work on the City Complex job. All stated they understood their refusals would be considered insubordination and could result in termination. Reasons for refusing ranged from fear of bodily harm, fear for safety of family or self, moral convictions, and unionism. With the exception of Thompson and Wilson, each of the linemen was told that he was relieved of his duties for 5 days and that he would probably be terminated. That afternoon Stanfield made arrangements with the Carpenters Union for removal of the pickets in the next 2 days. He immediately informed both Herring and the linemen of the development. Herring informed the men who reported for work the next morning that he could not guarantee that there would be no pickets on the job, that he thought their suspensions had been lifted since they returned to work, but that he could not guarantee anything and that they would probably be severely disciplined. The men completed the scheduled City Complex work by working both July 29 and 30.

In response to Nelson's indication to Bowden that the Respondent might file a lawsuit against the Union because of the refusal to work, the Union, over Assistant Business Manager Hill's signature, informed Gelinas in writing dated July 29, that it was notifying Respondent in accordance with article I of the collective-bargaining agreement that the Union did not authorize the "stoppage, strike, slowdown or suspension of work at the Flagstaff City Complex," and had made every effort to insure that the job assignments to the job would be manned and completed. A copy of the letter was posted in the Flagstaff construction yard on July 30. It is undisputed that this was the first occasion the Union has ever sent such a letter to the Respondent. Contrary to the Respondent's position, I do not view Hill's letter as an explicit, unmistakable waiver divesting the employees of their statutory right to refuse to engage in a sympathy strike which had already taken place.

On August 2, Herring issued the following identical memo to each of the men that had engaged in the sympathy strike at the City Complex:

> On July 28, 1982, you were in violation of Article I, Section 2, of the Bargaining Agreement by participating in a work stoppage.
> Your actions were unacceptable and could have resulted in termination of employment. However, because you did return to work the following day, on the same job, and perform your work in a safe efficient manner, you will only be suspended for three (3) working days. You will be advised as to when the suspension will take place.
> I must advise you that any further violation of Article I, Section 2, in the future can result in termination of your employment.

Staggered 3-day suspension resulted.

E. Conclusions

The complaint alleges the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by issuing 3-day staggered suspensions of Jerry Murphy, Edwin M. Wilson, Gerald Nelson, Gary Smith, Clifford Miles, Nap Birner, Mark R. Finfrock, and Dale Hudson because they engaged in a sympathy strike and refused to cross the Carpenters Union's picket line to perform work at the City Complex.

The General Counsel contends the Union has never waived unit employees' Section 7 right to engage in sympathy strikes and honor lawful picket lines of other unions at sites where unit employees are scheduled to perform work for Respondent, and that by disciplining its employees for engaging in a sympathy strike at the City Complex, Respondent violated the Act as alleged in the complaint.

The Respondent points out that the collective-bargaining agreement contains a no-strike clause and that the Union clearly and unmistakenly waived the bargaining unit employees' right to participate in sympathy strikes through years of past practice, bargaining history, overt statements, and conduct by union representatives and clear and unequivocal contract language. Accordingly, it is contended, the disciplinary action taken against the employees for engaging in a sympathy strike was not unlawful.

Thus, the principal issue is whether the Union waived the Section 7 right of the Respondent's employees to engage in sympathy strikes and honor the picket lines of other unions at sites where the Respondent's employees have been scheduled to work.

It is fundamental that the right to strike is guaranteed by the Act, including the right to engage in a sympathy strike or honor another union's picket line. Such rights may, however, be waived by appropriate provisions in a collective-bargaining agreement. The Board and the courts have repeatedly emphasized that such waivers will not be readily inferred, and there must be a clear and unmistakable showing that waiver occurred. Gary-Hobart Water Corp., 210 NLRB 742, 744 (1974), enfd. 511 F.2d 284 (7th Cir. 1975), cert. denied 423 U.S. 925 (1975). In the Board's view, broad no-strike clauses, without more, are insufficient to establish waiver of the right to engage in sympathy strikes. Rather, any waiver of the right to engage in a sympathy strike may be found only "in express contractual language or in unequivocal extrinsic evidence bearing upon ambiguous contractual language." Operating Engineers Local 18 (Davis-McKee, Inc.), 238 NLRB 652 (1978). As is clear from a reading of article I, section 2, no mention is made of sympathy strikes or refusals to cross another union's picket line. Therefore, a waiver, if any, must be implied; "however, the waiver of statutory rights is not lightly to be inferred." Gary-Hobart Water, supra at 745. I find no basis for inferring that Respondent's employees' right to engage in sympathy strikes was relinquished. The no-strike prohibition in article I, section 2, of the contract clearly is posed as the quid pro quo for recourse to a grievance procedure. Article VII, sections 1 and 3, limit grievances to those matters concerning a "breach" of or "application or interpretaton of this agreement." It is obvious that the dispute between the Carpenters and the City Complex contractors was not capable of being heard and determined under the Respondent's grievance machinery. Consequently, by joining the Carpenters' union strike, Respondent's employees were engaging in an activity that was not arbitrable and therefore not proscribed by the no-strike clause. Inland Steel Co., 264 NLRB 84 (1982); Southern California Edison Co., 243 NLRB 372 (1979), enfd. as modified 646 F.2d 1352 (9th Cir. 1981); Gary-Hobart Water, supra.

Additional evidence shows that the parties' intent or belief as to what the no-strike provision covered was unclear. At the outset, it is noted that the record is void of any evidence regarding any intent, understanding, or discussion had in 1949 when it first appeared in the contract, regarding the applicability of article I, section 2, to sympathy strikes or refusals to cross other unions' picket lines. Over the 30 plus intervening years that article I, section 2, had been in the contract, there have been numerous instances when employees performed work behind stranger picket lines, and numerous instances when they have refused to do so with impunity. In fact, Farthing, Respondent's customer service representative in Flagstaff, was doubtful whether the linemen would work on the City Complex because of the pickets. The only positive conclusion that may be drawn from past practice is that the Respondent had maintained a general policy of deferring service in the face of stranger picket lines, and of enlisting the services of the Union in obtaining removal of the pickets so that its employees would perform work at premises where disputes existed between other unions and employers.

Further evidence indicated there was no clear and unmistakable understanding that the no-strike clause covered sympathy strikes. During both the 1980 and 1982 negotiations, Respondent proposed changes in the language of article I, section 2, to "clarify" that sympathy strikes were prohibited. On both occasions the Union rejected the proposals and they were withdrawn. As the Board stated in Gary-Hobart, supra at 746, "By such conduct the Respondent demonstrated its uncertainty as to whether it had obtained a waiver of the right to engage in a sympathy strike in the no-strike clause it sought to change. The Union, on the other hand, by rejecting the proposed changes demonstrated its determination not to waive the right to honor another union's picket line." In the posthearing brief, Respondent states: "In the 1982 negotiations, it is clear that Gelinas proposed to modify Article I, Section 2 to include sympathy strikes, carefully explained what APS meant by the term sympathy strike, and he and other APS representatives fully answered all questions from Union representatives relating to that issue." It is argued that statements made by Bowden led the Respondent's negotiators to believe that the Union agreed that the language of article I, section 2, was broad enough to cover sympathy strikes, and it was on that basis that the proposed language change was withdrawn. The Union's negotiators denied Bowden made such a commitment. The evidence does not convince me that Bowden conceded that the language already encompassed sympathy strikes.

Other factors convince me there has never been an understanding or agreement between the Respondent and the Union that the language of article I, section 2, encompassed sympathy strikes. Article XI of the contract provides that "all previous agreements and understandings . . . and all negotiations, whether oral or written . . . are superseded by this agreement." Obviously the language of article I, section 2, does not contain express language waiving the right to engage in sympathy strikes. Nor, for that matter, do any of the letters of mutual agreement appended to the current collective-bargaining agreement, including the March 31 letter from Gelinas to Bowden confirming understandings arrived at during 1982 negotiations. While there was testimony that other oral understandings were made, I am convinced that an agreement on sympathy strikes—which Respondent admits was an important item—would have been recorded in the March 31 letter of understanding if in fact reached.

In sum, I conclude that Respondent's attempt to broaden the no-strike clause to cover "sympathy strikes" was not successful. The collective-bargaining agreement does not prohibit unit employees from honoring picket lines of other unions, and the evidence fails to establish that the parties had a clear understanding when they executed the last contract that it barred sympathy strikes. The contract is a complex document that obviously was not written by amateurs. If the parties had intended that sympathy strikes should be included within the prohibition of article I, section 2, they could have said so in clear unequivocal terms. Instead, the Respondent has sought to include it by amending article I, section 2, during the last two negotiation terms. Accordingly, I find that Murphy, Wilson, Nelson, Smith, Miles, Birner, Finfrock, and Hudson were engaged in protected concerted activity when they refused to work on the Flagstaff City Complex.

Respondent also argues that disciplining the eight men for refusing to carry out their job assignments on July 28 was justified because supported by a legitimate and substantial business necessity, in that: (1) erection of the steel columns presented grave danger of contact with the energized overhead lines scheduled for removal; (2) Respondent had already postponed the work at the site because of the pickets and it had been ordered by the city to complete the work immediately; and (3) it had obtained assurances from the Carpenters Union that its employees would not be in danger of violence. Respondent contends that since under Redwing Carriers, 137 NLRB 1545 (1962), and Newberry Energy Corp., 227 NLRB 436 (1976), it would have been justified in discharging the eight employees, "a three day suspension was certainly lawful." It contends, "To read Redwing and its progeny to hold that permanent replacement is the Employer's only alternative to complete business disruption and incredibly high liability exposure is patently unfair and elevates form over substance."

The Board's position is set forth in Gary-Hobart Water, supra at 746 thusly:

> The Board has held in cases involving sympathy strikes, although primarily when the activity was engaged in at the premises of another employer, that although the refusal to cross the picket line of another union is protected this right must be balanced against the business interest of the employer, and that it is only when the employer's business interest to replace employees is such as clearly to outweigh the employees' protected right that an invasion of the statutory right is justified (Redwing Carriers, Inc., 137 NLRB 1545; Overnite Transportation Co., 154 NLRB 1271). The termination of employees is justified where the employer "acted only to preserve efficient operation of his business, and terminated the . . . employees only so it could immediately or within a short period thereafter replace them. . . ." (Redwing Carriers, supra, 1547). [Emphasis added.]

In Southern California Edison, supra at 372, the Board went on to state that "an employer may not merely equate the employee's refusal to cross the picket line with an act of insubordination." In the instant case it is clear that the suspensions were not to preserve Respondent's efficient operations, but were in fact punitive. Upon their return to the yard from the City Complex, Herring asked each of the sympathy strikers if he realized he was taking part in a work stoppage and told them "if they continued to refuse to work this job, it would be considered insubordination and could result in their termination." Moreover, as the work was completed in the following 2 days by the alleged discriminatees—prior to replacement or issuance of the disciplinary letters—the Respondent could no longer claim economic necessity as a basis for the discipline. It is clear that the discipline was imposed for engaging in a sympathy strike on July 28.

In sum, I find that the eight linemen were not disciplined because of economic necessity but for engaging in a sympathy strike, a protected concerted activity. None of the men was either replaced or terminated, and the work was in fact performed by them prior to the issuance of the disciplinary suspensions. Accordingly, by issuing staggered 3-day suspensions to the eight employees, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union and Arizona State District Council of Carpenters, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO are each labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By issuing 3-day staggered suspensions to Jerry Murphy, Edwin M. Wilson, Gerald Nelson, Gary Smith, Clifford Miles, Nap Birner, Mark R. Finfrock, and Dale Hudson for engaging in a sympathy strike, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully suspended Jerry Murphy, Edwin M. Wilson, Gerald Nelson, Gary Smith, Clifford Miles, Nap Birner, Mark R. Finfrock, and Dale Hudson in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, it is recommended that Respondent expunge from its records any reference to such suspensions because they refused to cross a picket line establised at the Flagstaff City Complex premises by the Carpenters Union, and notify each of them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him. It is further recommended that each of the above discriminatees be made whole for any loss of pay or other employment benefits he may have suffered as a result of said suspensions. DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 15 December 1983 Administrative Law Judge Robert T. Snyder issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a brief in support of the order dismissing the complaint, and the New York City Central Labor Council, AFL–CIO filed an amicus brief in support of the Charging Party's exceptions.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by withdrawing recognition from and refusing to bargain with the Union. For the reasons set forth below, we do not agree.

The Respondent is a private, state-chartered, tuition-free institution of higher education consisting of three professional degree-granting schools: Engineering, Art, and Architecture. It has a student body of approximately 900, about half of whom are engineering students, and a full-time faculty of approximately 60. In 1974 the Union was certified to represent a unit of full-time faculty members and librarians. Part-time (adjunct) faculty were not included in the bargaining unit. In 1978 the parties entered into their only collective-bargaining agreement, which expired in August 1980. Shortly before the expiration of the agreement the Respondent by its president Lacy informed the Union that it would not negotiate with the Union for a new agreement because it considered the faculty to be managerial employees within the meaning of the Supreme Court's opinion in NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672 (1980). The issue in this case is whether the faculty employed by the Respondent "formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employer,"[2] such that they are managerial employees excluded from the coverge of the Act. We summarize below the facts which we regard as determinative of the issues. We review first the formal governance structure for faculty participation in institutional decision making and then actual governance practice.

Formal Governance

The Respondent's charter vests ultimate management and control in a board of trustees. Currently there are 16 trustees, 3 of whom are alumni representatives. There are no faculty representatives. The Respondent's bylaws vest in the president general supervisory powers over its activities, subject to the trustees' control. The bylaws provide that the president's powers include the appointment and removal of administrators, faculty, and staff, and the determination of their duties. The bylaws also vest general supervisory powers over academic affairs and academic officers in a provost. Since 1964 the faculty's role in institutional decision making has been defined formally in a faculty policy manual and a set of "governances." Each professional school has its own governance. The governances have been amended a number of times. Pursuant to the governances, the faculty members of each school meet as a separate deliberative body, collectively referrred to as the school's faculty. The governances define the faculty of each school to include, as voting members, the dean and any assistant or associate deans, as well as all full-time faculty members of the school. The dean of each school is designated the permanent chairperson of its faculty with responsibility for calling and presiding over faculty meetings, preparing the agenda, and communicating faculty actions to the president. The governances call for two or three regular faculty meetings each year (depending on the school) and any number of special meetings. The governances also provide for institutionwide joint faculty meetings to be called and presided over by the president. No frequency for such meetings is specified. Each governance provides that it may be amended by a vote of two-thirds of the school's faculty and approval by the trustees.

Under the governances, the duties and responsibilities of the faculties are to be carried out primarily through members' participation in standing committees. Each school has its own administrative, admissions, academic standards, and curriculum committees.[3] There are also two institutionwide standing committees, Academic Freedom and Tenure (AF&T) and Student Activities, and an institutionwide student-faculty Senate.

[1] No exceptions were taken to the judge's findings that the Respondent's assistant librarians excercise neither supervisory nor managerial authority.

According to the governances, the administrative committee of each school is responsible for the "general administration" of the school including financial and personnel matters; for approval of curriculum changes proposed by the curriculum committee; and for nomination of candidates for positions on the standing committees. The administrative committee is required to represent faculty interests and to interpret those interests to the president, and it is to serve as advisor to the dean. The dean of each school chairs its administrative committee. In the Schools of Art and Architecture, full-time faculty members constitute both a numerical and a voting minority on the administrative committees, sharing seats with administrators, students, and adjunct faculty members.

The curriculum committees have responsibility for receiving, formulating, and processing proposed curriculum changes. The curriculum committee in each school must forward proposals for curriculum changes to the administrative committee, which may approve minor changes (such as the substitution of one course for a similar course), but must forward proposals for major changes to the faculty for its approval. The faculty must then submit major curriculum changes which it approves to the president. In the Schools of Art and Architecture, the membership of the respective curriculum committees consists of two full-time faculty members, one adjunct faculty member, and one student as voting members; and the dean of the school, the dean of admissions, and an alumni representative as nonvoting members. The chairperson must be a full-time faculty member. In the Engineering school, the committee is composed of one full-time faculty member from each of the four disciplines. The dean of the Engineering school is designated an "ex officio" member, but the Engineering governance, unlike the governances for Art and Architecture, does not provide that the dean has no vote.

The academic standards committees have responsibility for receiving and considering proposed changes in the grading system and academic standards. Minor changes may be acted on by the committee. Major changes must be approved by the faculty and the president. The committees also have final authority to pass on petitions for readmission from students who have withdrawn or have been dropped for academic reasons, as well as responsibility for compiling a list of recommended candidates for graduation. In the Schools of Art and Architecture, each academic standards committee is composed of three full-time faculty members, one student, and one adjunct faculty member as voting members; and the dean of the school, the dean of admissions, and the dean of students as nonvoting members. The chairperson must be a full-time faculty member. In Engineering, the committee is composed of four full-time faculty members and three deans. Again, the deans are designated "ex officio," but, unlike the deans on the corresponding committees in the other two schools, are not designated as nonvoting.

The admissions committees are responsibile for establishing and reviewing admissions procedures pursuant to institutional and faculty policies. In the Schools of Art and Architecture, the committees are each composed of two full-time faculty members, one student, and one adjunct faculty member as voting members; and the dean of the school, the dean of admissions, and an alumnus as nonvoting members. The chairperson must be a full-time faculty member. In Engineering, the committee is composed of three full-time faculty members, the dean of admissions, and a student as voting members; with the dean of the school as an ex officio member.

The Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee is an all faculty, institutionwide body with limited authority set forth in the faculty policy manual to hear disputes involving alleged infringements of faculty members' academic freedom and termination of tenured faculty allegedly without adequate cause. Adequate cause for termination of tenured faculty is defined as professional incompetence, conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude, or a change in academic program or the existence of a financial condition that requires elimination of the position. Actions of the AF&T Committee are subject to review by the trustees. The committee has no authority to consider types of disciplinary action or other grievance matters beyond those specified in the manual.

The Student Activities Committee is an institutionwide committee with responsibility for formulating, proposing, and monitoring student policy. Students constitute a majority of the voting members; the dean of students is a voting member.

The Senate's role is to study the goals, standards, facilities, planning, development, and problems of Cooper Union, and to serve as advisor to the president. Its voting membership is approximately balanced between full-time faculty members and students,[4] with four administrators including the president serving as nonvoting members.

[3] According to the governances, each school also has a calendar and schedules committee. However, the record reflects that the calendar and schedules committees have been inoperative for most of the 10 years preceding the hearing.

An examination of the composition of the governance committees reveals that full-time faculty (bargaining unit) members are a numerical minority on most and are a voting majority on only about half of the committees. In two of the Respondent's three schools, Art and Architecture, full-time faculty members are a voting majority only on the academic standards committees. Full-time faculty members chair most of the committees. However, the administrative committee in each school, which has the broadest authority of any committee (including the authority to review actions of certain other committees and authority to nominate members to the other committees), is chaired by the dean.

The governances give the faculty certain responsibilities beyond those exercised through standing committees and the Senate. These include recommending degree candidates to the president, advising the respective deans on the filling of faculty positions, and recommending candidates to fill vacancies in the offices of dean and president. In the filling of faculty positions, the governances require only that the dean "consult" with faculty members. When a deanship or the presidency is to be filled, the governances call for the formation of a special faculty committee to submit a list of recommended candidates.

The faculty policy manual sets forth certain rights of faculty members beyond the rights and duties specified in the governances. It provides that a faculty member is eligible for sabbatical leave after each consecutive 7 years of service, but that the granting of sabbaticals to eligible members is in the discretion of the president. The manual sets time limits for achieving tenure. It provides that a faculty member should be granted tenure "as soon as he has demonstrated his competence and a satisfactory development of his teaching and scholarship." It encourages faculty members to engage in their own research, writing, artistic endeavors, and professional activities including consulting, so long as such activities do not conflict with academic duties.

Faculty Authority in Practice

Having reviewed the faculty's formally defined status, we now examine the role actually played by the faculty in the affairs of the Respondent during the approximately 10 years preceding the hearing in the present case.

Prior to 1972 the teaching staff of Cooper Union was organized in departments chaired by faculty members. By action of the trustees that year, taken without faculty vote or other faculty approval, the departments were consolidated into larger divisions, with division heads appointed by the president. The administration thereafter rejected a faculty recommendation that the departmental structure be restored and rejected a separate faculty recommendation that division heads be elected by faculty members.[5] Among other changes brought about by the elimination of the departmental structure was a decrease in faculty authority over the academically related activities of nonteaching staff such as laboratory assistants and secretaries. In addition to replacing the departmental structure with a divisional structure, the trustees in 1972 also created new degrees in mathematics and science. They also created and filled the position of provost. The faculties did not have an opportunity to vote on or otherwise approve or disapprove these changes.

In 1973 the provost, Kaplan, issued a report recommending increasing class size, increasing the student-faculty ratio, increasing teaching loads, severely limiting grants of tenure, reducing the number of full-time faculty through attrition, and increasing the proportion of adjunct faculty. While the Senate was considering these proposals, they were implemented without faculty approval and over strong faculty opposition. When members of the Senate confronted the provost with the fact that the proposals were being implemented while still under Senate consideration, the provost responded to the effect that the Senate could be most useful by simply approving the proposals. In accord with the provost's recommendation, then president White began rejecting many tenure recommendations even where a candidate had received unanimous faculty support. The decisions denying tenure were made largely for financial reasons, ignoring the exclusively academic criteria for the granting of tenure set forth in the faculty policy manual.

In 1975 the trustees again restructured the institution without faculty participation and over strong faculty opposition. The 1975 reorganization eliminated the divisions and the division head positions, leaving the schools the primary structural academic units. It divided what had been the School of Art and Architecture into two separate schools. It established a new "Faculty of Liberal Arts and Science" (LA&S) entirely outside of the degree-granting schools, placing nearly half the faculty members (some from Art and Architecture and some from Engineering) in the new group. The LA&S faculty members were thereby disenfranchised, no longer having a vote on the faculty of any degree-granting school, or authority to participate in its governance committees. (No governance was established for the LA&S faculty.) Provost Kaplan was designated acting dean of the new faculty. Also in the 1975 restructuring, the trustees eliminated the curricula leading to degrees in mathematics, physics, and distributive science, and eliminated physical education as a regular part of the curriculum. As a result, a number of tenured faculty members were permanently laid off.

[4] Two Senate seats may be filled either by full-time faculty members or by adjuncts. Therefore, full-time faculty members may or may not be a voting majority of the Senate, depending on whether those seats are filled by full-time faculty members.

[5] The Respondent's then president White rejected a governance amendment passed by the faculty of the School of Art and Architecture (then a single unit) requiring division heads to be elected by the faculty.

Faculty opposition to the changes brought about in 1975 was widespread and sustained, particularly with respect to the creation of the LA&S faculty and the elimination of the degree programs. During a senate meeting in which strong criticism of the 1975 changes and the way in which they were implemented was voiced, White informed the Senate that he was neither required to consult with the Senate nor to accept its advice. The Senate then voted to cease meeting because it was a group without any power. It remained defunct for approximately 3 years, until after the collective-bargaining agreement was entered into. During the same period, the administration successfully resisted an attempt by the tenured faculty members who had been laid off to gain a hearing before the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee.[6]

Also following the 1975 reogranization, the dean of the School of Engineering, without faculty consideration, promulgated an amended governance for that school. The dean's governance eliminated the administrative committee, delegating all administrative functions to the dean. It also created a new interim curriculum committee chaired by the dean. These amendments apparently remained in effect for approximately 4 years until newly revised governances were issued after the bargaining agreement was entered into.

In the late spring of 1977 President White announced plans for Cooper Union to enter into a library consortium agreement with New York University (N.Y.U.) and another university under which, among other things, administrative control and purchasing for the libraries of all three schools would be delegated to an N.Y.U. administrator. White asked for faculty response to the plan. The faculties of all three schools strongly opposed implementation of any such consortium agreement, pending further study. They voiced concerns on academic grounds including fear of loss of valuable library materials from Cooper Union's libraries and inability to readily procure new materials for the library. During the summer recess, before the faculties had had further opportunity to consider the matter, and over their expressed opposition, the Respondent entered into the consortium agreement. Two years later, in the summer of 1979, the library consortium agreement was extended prematurely and without notice to the faculty at a time when a faculty committee was at work on proposed revisions to the agreement.

In 1978 an organization responsible for accrediting educational institutions, the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools, issued a report on Cooper Union, following a detailed review of all aspects of the institution. The report commended Cooper Union in certain areas, particularly the handling of its financial resources, but found serious problems in the areas of faculty morale, faculty governance, long range planning, and the library consortium. The report found that the Respondent's deans were unusually strong and its faculty unusually weak. The report noted that the administration of Cooper Union had asserted the right to take actions affecting the institution in the absence of advice from the faculty or the Senate, and even contrary to such advice and then commented, "No doubt the right exists but to the degree it is exercised, confidence in faculty governance is subverted, and faculty morale declines." The report was especially critical of the Respondent for the morale problems caused by the creation of the academically isolated and disenfranchised LA&S faculty. The report also noted the absence of any provision for faculty review of institutionwide academic policies and indicated that the writers shared the concerns of the faculty that the library consortium would not lead to an improvement in the institution's library services.

The collective-bargaining agreement, entered into in 1978, contained, among others, provisions setting salary levels; stating principles of academic freedom; setting procedural guidelines for the appointment, promotion, and tenure of faculty members; defining workload; establishing a grievance and arbitration procedure; and defining management rights. Shortly after the agreement went into effect, the Union's president Tulchin and the Respondent's president White jointly issued governances which reflected changes necessitated by the bargaining agreement, such as the elimination of the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee in view of its functions having been taken over by the grievance and arbitration procedure. Tulchin also entered into discussions with Provost Kaplan concerning the LA&S faculty. These discussions, sanctioned by the Union's executive committee, resulted in a 1979 decision to reintegrate the LA&S faculty into the faculties of the degree-granting schools, reenfranchising them as members of those faculties.

[6] The Respondent took the position that the elimination of the degree programs was not a change in academic program within the meaning of the academic freedom and tenure provisions of the faculty policy manual, and therefore was not cognizable by the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee. The laid-off faculty members sought to gain a hearing before that committee by bringing a state court suit. The Respondent took the position before the state court that the trustees had an unreviewable right to make decisions on academic programs and cited other examples of the trustees having done so without faculty input. The state court denied the laid-off faculty members' request for a hearing before the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee.

Following the Respondent's 1980 withdrawal of recognition from the Union, the Respondent's new president Lacy revised the governances to reinsert those provisions taken out because of the bargaining agreement and to reflect the structural changes brought about by the reintegration of the LA&S faculty. The faculty did not participate in or vote on these revisions. In conformance with the revised governances, Lacy reinstituted the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee.[7] Elected faculty members agreed to serve on that committee under protest. In 1981 Lacy announced certain increases in faculty salary levels. The faculty did not participate in setting the amounts of these increases.

In addition to the major institutional decisions and events outlined above, certain other facts are indicative of the relative authority of the Respondent's faculty and its administration. As described more fully in the judge's decision, faculty members regularly participate, primarily through the governance committees, in decisions regarding admissions, academic standards (including student retention, readmission, and graduation), and curriculum. Yet the effectiveness of the faculty's role in each of these areas is limited. A limitation on the faculty's authority which pervades all three areas is the extent of administration and other nonfaculty representation on the committees, as described above.

In the area of admissions, although faculty members play a major role in setting admissions standards and, in the Schools of Art and Architecture, passing on the applications of individual candidates, goals for the numbers of students to be admitted are determined by the administration. In the School of Engineering, the exact number to be admitted is set by the administration. Further, the dean of admissions testified that he implemented a program for admissions of minority students in engineering without faculty or admissions committee approval and in the presence of mixed faculty opinion.

In the curriculum area, courses suggested by individual bargaining unit or nonbargaining unit teaching staff are frequently instituted on the approval of the dean without going through the curriculum and administrative committees. In addition to the major curriculum changes noted above brought about by decision of the trustees to create and eliminate degree programs, a curriculum-related change was brought about by the dean of the Engineering school in the area of physics over the unanimous opposition of the full-time physics faculty.[8]

In the area of academic standards, the faculty plays perhaps its strongest role. The governances make decisions of the academic standards committees final in the area of student petitions for readmission. Grade point averages required to remain enrolled and to graduate are set by the committees with faculty approval. Although theoretically subject to administrative approval, there is no evidence that committee and faculty recommendations in this area have ever been overturned. Nevertheless, the authority of faculty members in the academic standards area is mitigated by the admitted active participation and voting—in contravention of the governances—of the deans of admissions and students on all three academic standards committees.[9] This means that although a theoretical voting majority on these committees, faculty members in fact are a voting minority. Faculty and administrators share responsibility for developing the academic calendar and course schedules, but the deans assign faculty members to teach required courses. Although faculty members have some input, the dean's view prevails in the event of a conflict.

A final limitation on the exercise of faculty authority in academic matters is the ability of administrators in key positions to prevent faculty groups from meeting. The Respondent's president has sole authority to call joint faculty meetings. Following a 1975 joint faculty meeting in which a motion was [7] When Lacy reinstituted the AF&T Committee it had been inoperative for approximately 6 years. Its members had resigned in 1975 during a dispute over whether the committee should hear the complaint of a faculty member who had been denied tenure.

[8] The dean determined that two physics courses should be among the courses used for an experimental program employing innovative teaching methods. The full-time physics faculty, for academic reasons, unanimously opposed using the new program in the physics courses. The dean insisted that the courses be taught in the experimental mode and brought in a retired physics professor to teach them when the full-time faculty members refused.

[9] We further note that in two instances the dean of the School of Architecture, in contravention of normal procedure and over the apparent opposition of the faculty involved, permitted students who had failed a required fourth year course, which was prerequisite to a required fifth year course, to take both courses simultaneously in their fifth year, thereby also permitting the students to exceed the normal credit limit in their fifth year.

made to censure President White for allegedly interfering with the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee, White called no more faculty meetings for the remaining 4 years of his presidency. Similarly, the dean of the Architecture school prevented its administrative committee from meeting for a period of 4 years from 1977 to 1981 by failing to call any meetings. During that time the administrative committee's function in reviewing proposed curriculum changes was simply bypassed.

In nonacademic matters, the very limited effective role played by the faculty has been set forth fully in the judge's decision. Certain points in this regard bear emphasis. The faculty has virtually no role in the areas of budget and facilities. Major decisions to sell and renovate facilities and to relocate personnel and activities within them have been made without faculty input or over faculty opposition. Similarly, faculty office space is assigned by the administration and, at least in the Engineering school, even faculty access to ordinary office supplies is restricted. Faculty members have no input into the appointment, retention, or employment conditions of nonteaching staff such as laboratory assistants, shop assistants, library personnel, and secretaries. In regard to the appointment of teaching staff, although the governances call for a consultative faculty role, such a role has frequently been bypassed. Similarly, although faculty members have regularly been consulted on tenure decisions, their recommendations have frequently been reversed. Faculty members have no role in granting sabbatical leaves. In the selection of deans, the faculty role called for in the governances has sometimes been ignored. In the selection of a president to take White's place in 1979, the procedure for faculty input called for in the governance was not followed.[10] Other administrative positions have been created and filled without faculty input.

The Legal Standard—Yeshiva and Its Progeny

In NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672 (1980), the Supreme Court found that the faculty members were managerial employees excluded from the coverage of the Act. It defined managerial employees, as both the Board and the Court previously had, to be those who "formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employer."[11] The Court refined this definition by holding that managerial employees "must exercise discretion within or even independently of established employer policy and must be aligned with management" and normally must "represent management interests by taking or recommending discretionary actions that effectively control or implement employer policy."[12] The Court held that the purpose of excluding managerial employees, like the purpose of excluding supervisors from the Act's coverage, is to assure employers of the undivided loyalty of their representatives.

The Court found that the faculty at Yeshiva, through participation in faculty meetings and on faculty committees, determined each school's curriculum, academic calendar, course schedules, admissions and matriculation standards, teaching methods and grading policies, and sometimes determined tuition, the size of the student body, and the location of a school. The Court concluded that the faculty's control of academic matters was absolute. In nonacademic matters, the Court found that the faculty played the predominant role in decisions on faculty hiring, tenure, sabbaticals, termination, and promotion. The Court noted that although the final decisions on such personnel matters are made by the administration, the faculty makes recommendations in all cases and "the overwhelming majority of faculty recommendations are implemented."[13] The Court also noted that, at least in some of the schools, budget requests were made by faculty, and that in the case of one school such requests had never been rejected. The Court found unpersuasive the fact that many faculty decisions were subject to rarely exercised veto power in the administration. In concluding that the Yeshiva University faculty were managerial employees, the Court relied primarily on their extensive authority over academic affairs, but also noted their predominant authority in nonacademic matters. The Court noted that at other institutions, unlike Yeshiva, faculty members may be nonmanagerial, depending on the extent of their authority, commenting, "It is plain, for example, that professors may not be excluded merely because they determine the content of their own courses, evaluate their own students, and supervise their own research."[14]

Since the Supreme Court decided Yeshiva, the Board has determined the managerial or nonmanagerial status of college and university faculty members in a variety of faculty settings. For example, in [10] Instead of forming the special faculty committee called for in the governances to submit names of qualified candidates to the trustees, a large number of candidates were screened and interviewed with no faculty input. The Senate was then permitted to interview and make recommendations on the top two candidates previously selected by the administration. The candidate whom the Senate recommended, Lacy, was chosen by the trustees.

Ithaca College, 261 NLRB 577 (1982), the Board found that the faculty, through participation in both institutionwide and divisional bodies, determined curriculum, admissions policies, academic standards, class size, course schedules, teaching assignments, graduation requirements, and other academic matters. The Board noted that although recommendations of institutionwide academic policy subcommittees composed entirely of faculty members must be approved by a committee on which students and administrators also participate, the student-faculty-administration committee had invariably approved the recommendations of the faculty subcommittees. In concluding that the faculty controlled curriculum changes, the Board noted that, although the deans in some schools must approve curriculum changes, the dean in one school had approved all of about 500 such changes recommended by the faculty. The Board also found that the faculty controlled the hiring of faculty members and deans, faculty tenure, and had an effective voice in facilities planning and budgetary matters. The Board concluded that the faculty were managerial employees under Yeshiva.

By contrast, in Bradford College, 261 NLRB 565 (1982), the Board found that the faculty were nonmanagerial where governance documents indicated they had substantial authority, but in practice they had little. The Board found that the faculty did not effectively determine teaching loads, salaries, budget, the filling of administrative positions, faculty evaluations, or certain faculty personnel actions. The Board also found that the adminstration had canceled an academic session without faculty approval, had sometimes altered grades given by faculty members, and at least in some cases had failed to follow faculty recommendations for the hiring of new faculty members. In determining that the faculty lacked effective authority, the Board noted a statement of the president of the college to the effect that it was the administration and not the faculty which set academic and administrative policy. The Board also noted an accrediting agency's report which found disregard for stated procedures and for faculty participation in the administration of the college. The Board concluded, "In sum, while the faculty and division chairs have the written right to make recommendations, the record shows that such recommendations were often ignored or reversed by the president, by the academic dean, or by both with respect to curriculum, admission policies, graduation of students, course loads, course scheduling, grading of students, faculty hiring or retention, tuition, and faculty salaries."[15]

In a case which, like the present one, involved the faculty of a professional degree-granting institution, College of Osteopathic Medicine & Surgery, 265 NLRB 295 (1982), the Board found that the faculty were managerial employees. There the faculty had drafted its own constitution providing for monthly faculty meetings, and had established faculty committees. All voting members of many of the committees, including those concerned with promotion, tenure, postgraduate education, and student promotion and evaluation, were elected by the faculty. In addition to determining curriculum and other academic matters, the college's faculty also was instrumental in bringing about a fundamental change in academic program (conversion from a 3-year to a 4-year course of study). Further, the faculty had considerable authority in faculty hiring, rank, promotion, and tenure decisions. The Board concluded that the faculty had "almost plenary authority in academic matters and significant input into important nonacademic matters."[16] Citing Yeshiva, the Board held that the fact that many faculty actions were in the form of recommendations with final authority resting in the administration was not determinative since "faculty recommendations are almost always followed."[17]

Analysis

In the instant case, the judge concluded that under Yeshiva and subsequent Board decisions the faculty of Cooper Union have sufficient authority to formulate and effectuate policy to be excluded from the coverage of the Act as managerial employees, and consequently recommended dismissing the complaint. Our disagreement with the judge's conclusion and recommendation stems from our disagreement with certain of his factual findings and from our disagreement with his application of Yeshiva principles to the facts of this case.

The judge based his conclusion that the Respondent's faculty members are managerial employees partly on his findings (1) that the faculty predominate in "almost all" of the governance committees; (2) that the administrative committees play a central role in faculty involvement in both academic and administrative (financial and personnel) matters; and (3) that significant faculty input into nonacademic matters was shown in the Union's 1979 negotiations with the Respondent resulting in the reintegration of the Liberal Arts and Science faculty into the degree-granting schools. These key findings misinterpret the evidence. It is clear, as noted above, that even according to the terms of the governances, full-time faculty (bargaining unit) members constitute a numerical minority on most of the governance committees and constitute something less than a voting majority on about half of them. The proportion of faculty members who vote on the committees is further reduced in some cases by administrators voting on committees in contravention of the terms of the governances.

We further disagree with the judge's finding that the faculty's role on the administrative committees is indicative of extensive faculty authority. First, as the judge noted, each administrative committee is chaired by a dean who sets the agenda and may prevent the committee from meeting, as the dean of the School of Architecture did for 4 years. Second, as noted above, the academic standards committee of the largest school, Engineering, apparently was entirely eliminated for a 4-year period by the dean's unilateral governance amendment. Third, the record reflects an extremely limited role played by the administrative committees, when they are functioning, in personnel, financial, and other nonacademic matters. Finally, full-time faculty members constitute a voting minority on the administrative committees in the Schools of Art and Architecture.

Although the judge found, and we agree, that the faculty play a weaker role in nonacademic than in academic matters, he found a significant instance of faculty input into nonacademic decision making in the Union's role in negotiating the 1979 reintegration of the LA&S faculty into the degree-granting schools. While these negotiations did represent faculty involvement in matters which had both academic and nonacademic aspects, we note that the reintegration and reenfranchisement of the LA&S faculty represented a return to the status quo ante which had been pressed by the faculty in a variety of forums for the 4-year period since the administration created the separate faculty. Further, the Respondent's agreement to return to the status quo ante came only after the Middle States Association accrediting agency had strongly criticized it for the isolation, disenfranchisement, and consequent demoralization of the LA&S faculty. Under these circumstances, we do not think it indicative of strong faculty involvement in institutional policy making that the negotiations succeeded in 1979. The entire episode of the creation of the LA&S faculty, its persistence as an isolated group for 4 years, followed by its reintegration into the rest of the institution's governance system, is more illustrative of the ability of the administration to effectively resist faculty pressure than of the faculty's active participation in institutionwide decision making.[18]

Although the Respondent's faculty clearly exercise considerable authority in academic areas such as curriculum, admissions, academic standards, course assignments, and scheduling, such authority not only is not absolute as was the authority of the Yeshiva faculty, but frequently has been made ineffective by the administration in the variety of ways described above. Of particular significance in this regard are the administration's creation and elimination of entire degree programs without faculty input or over faculty opposition,[19] the exclusion from academic governance of a large proportion of the faculty for a number of years, the amendment of governances without faculty vote,[20] creation of a special admissions program without faculty approval, and the key roles played by administrators in chairing the faculties, chairing the joint faculty, chairing the administrative committees, and participating actively in other committees. Also highly significant is the fact that the administration first entered into and later extended the library consortium agreement over massive faculty opposition based on academic grounds. In this context, we regard the fact that faculty members are actively involved in making more routine academic decisions such as the substitution of one course for another and, in the Schools of Art and Architecture, the admission of individual applicants does not rise to the level of "represent[ing] management interests by taking or recommending discretionary actions that effectively control or implement employer policy," or "formulat[ing] and effectuat[ing] management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employer" within the meaning of Yeshiva. It is clear that the Cooper Union faculty have considerably less effective authority in the academic sphere than did the faculty in Yeshiva and the faculties in various Board deci-

[18] Further, we do not regard the faculty's participation in the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee as indicative of a strong faculty role in nonacademic matters in view of the fact that that committee did not function from 1975 to 1981, and in view of the Respondent's role in preventing it from hearing certain issues involving faculty tenure prior to that time.

[19] In this respect, the present case is similar to Bradford College, supra, where the elimination of an academic program without faculty input was a factor relied on by the Board in finding the faculty nonmanagerial.

[20] In this and the other ways, noted above, where stated governance requirements for faculty input have been overlooked by the administration, the present case bears further similarity to Bradford College. Similarities also include accredidation agency reports critical of the relative lack of faculty authority in each institution and statements by the respective presidents minimizing faculty authority.

sions following Yeshiva in which the faculty have been held managerial.[21]

Moreover, unlike the Yeshiva faculty and the faculties involved in subsequent Board decisions, the Cooper Union faculty lacks substantial input into nonacademic matters such as budget, facilities planning, and personnel decisions. In this regard we note particularly that decisions on the hiring, promotion, tenure, and retention of teaching staff are frequently made in the absence of faculty recommendations, and when they are made following faculty recommendations, those recommendations are frequently rejected.[22]

For the reasons stated above, we conclude that the Respondent's full-time faculty members are not managerial employees under Yeshiva, but are employees entitled to the protection of the Act.[23] Accordingly, the Respondent was required to bargain with the Union as the certified representative of the Respondent's full-time faculty and librarians. Therefore, we conclude that, by withdrawing recognition from the Union and thereafter refusing to bargain with it, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, as alleged.

THE REMEDY

Having found that by engaging in the above-described conduct the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist therefrom and from any like or related unfair labor practices, and to bargain on request with the Union.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, The Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Withdrawing recognition from and thereafter failing and refusing to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit on terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement; and provide the Union, on request, information necessary for collective bargaining:

> All faculty on full-time appointment including instructors, assistant professors, associate professors, full professors and librarians and assistant librarians but excluding all other employees, including the president, deans, assistant deans, acting deans, division heads, acting division heads, visiting faculty, secretaries, guards, library head, library assistants, library technicians, researchers, laboratory managers, directors, administrators, administrative assistants, administrative counselors, controller, registrar, provost, maintenance employees, laboratory technicians, laboratory assistants, engineering technicians, shop assistants and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Post at its facility in New York, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[24] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[21] For example, in Ithaca College, supra, the Board relied on the invariable adoption of faculty recommendations in academic areas as indicative of faculty authority. In the present case, faculty wishes in academic areas have frequently been ignored. Similarly, in College of Osteopathic Medicine & Surgery, supra, the Board relied on 100 percent faculty composition of key committees and faculty initiation of a major change in the entire academic curriculum as indicative of faculty authority. In the present case, by contrast, only 1 of some 14 faculty committees is 100 percent faculty in composition, and it was inoperative for most of the 10 years prior to the hearing, and major changes in academic curricula, such as creation and elimination of degree programs, have been made without effective faculty input.

[22] This pattern of ineffective faculty voice in faculty personnel decisions stands in contrast to the strong role played by the faculty in such cases as Ithaca College and College of Osteopathic Medicine & Surgery.

[23] In light of our finding that the Respondent's full-time faculty members are employees entitled to the protection of the Act, we further find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, recognize and bargain with the above-named Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All faculty on full-time appointment including instructors, assistant professors, associate professors, full professors and librarians and assistant librarians but excluding all other employees, including the president, deans, assistant deans, acting deans, division heads, acting division heads, visiting faculty, secretaries, guards, library head, library assistants, library technicians, researchers, laboratory managers, directors, administrators, administrative assistants, administrative counselors, controller, registrar, provost, maintenance employees, laboratory technicians, laboratory assistants, engineering technicians, shop assistants and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

THE COOPER UNION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE AND ART

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT T. SNYDER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 31 days during the period from January 4 through March 4, 1982, at New York, New York, pursuant to a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 2 of the National Labor Relations Board on April 30, 1981. The complaint was based on a charge filed by Cooper Union Federation of College Teachers, affiliated with New York State United Teachers, American Federation of Teachers, AFL–CIO (CUFCT or the Union) against The Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art (Respondent or Cooper Union). The complaint alleges, in substance, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act by withdrawing recognition, about June 26, 1980, from the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in a unit certified by the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) and by failing and refusing thereafter to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the unit.

Respondent, by its answer, denies the alleged violations and as affirmative defenses contends that all of the unit employees are supervisory employees and managerial employees, thereby excluded from the categories of employees entitled to the benefits of collective bargaining under the Act, and that the described unit is an inappropriate bargaining unit.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate in the proceeding to introduce all relevant evidence, to cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Respondent, the General Counsel, and the Union each filed extensive posthearing briefs. Respondent thereafter filed a reply brief, which, by subsequent order over objections of the other parties, I determined to receive and review and to which I provided the Charging Party and the General Counsel an opportunity to respond. Both parties have filed responsive briefs. These briefs have all been duly considered.

Leave having been sought by the New York City Central Labor Council, AFL–CIO to file a brief amicus curiae in support of the Charging party in this proceeding, such leave is hereby granted, and the brief it subsequently filed has also been duly considered.

On the entire record in this case, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a New York educational corporation chartered by a special legislative act, "Chapter 279 of the Laws of 1859," with its offices and educational facilities located in New York, New York, where it is engaged in the operation of a private, not-for-profit educational institution. Its gross annual revenue from all sources exceeds $1 million, excluding contributions, which, because of limitation by the grantor, are not available for operating expenses. Annually, Respondent in the course and conduct of its operations, purchases and receives at its facilities goods and materials valued in excess of $5000 directly from points outside the State of New York. The parties admit, and I find, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

At the opening of the hearing, Respondent was permitted to amend its answer to admit the status of the Union as a labor organization within the meaning of the Act. However, in view of its position consistently maintained throughout the proceeding, that the employees who make up the unit regarding which it has, since June 26, 1980, refused to bargain are not employees within the meaning of the Act, and since membership in the Union is limited to employees employed by Respondent in the bargaining unit, I do not deem Respondent's admission regarding the Union's status as a labor organization as controlling. That status will turn on my conclusions regarding the employee status under the Act of the members of the bargaining unit based on the record in this case, ruling on which will, accordingly, be deferred until that conclusion is made in a later portion of this decision.

III. THE REPRESENTATION PROCEEDING AND COLLECTIVE-BARGAINING HISTORY

On April 11, 1974, in Case 2–RC–16460, the Regional Director for Region 2, based on a petition previously filed by the Union, approved a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election providing for a representation election in a bargaining unit of Respondent's employees, including all faculty on full-time appointment, including instructors, assistant professors, associate professors, full professors, librarians and assistant librarians, but excluding all other employees, including the president, deans, assistant deans, acting deans, division heads, acting division heads, visiting faculty, researchers, laboratory managers, directors, administrators, administrative assistants, administrative counselors, controller, registrar, provost, maintenance employees, laboratory technicians, laboratory assistants, engineering technicians, shop assistants and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

Thereafter, pursuant to an election held on October 15 and 16, 1974, in which the Union received a majority of the valid ballots cast, on October 24, 1974, the Regional Director for Region 2 issued a Certification of Representative, certifying the Union as exclusive representative for the purposes of collective bargaining of Respondent's employees in the unit previously described.

Bargaining between the parties commenced in early 1975 and continued for close to 100 sessions until March 1978, when agreement was finally reached on the terms of an initial agreement. In 1976, when negotiations broke down, services of a Federal mediator were sought. The mediation effort, which extended for a year into the fall of 1977, was unsuccessful. A series of ad hoc meetings followed between Michael Wurmfeld, associate professor of architecture, then secretary of the union and member of its bargaining team, at times accompanied by several other members of the faculty, and President John F. White, who had not previously been directly involved in negotiations. These meetings finally led to the breaking of the impasse and final agreement on terms of an agreement. Substantive contract terms as they relate to the nature of faculty authority in various academic and nonacademic areas will be examined at various later points in this decision.

Agreement was finally consummated on April 11, 1978, with the terms made effective from that date until August 31, 1980. Pursuant to a wage reopener clause, subsequent negotiations resulted in agreement made on September 25, 1979, on wage rates for the contract year beginning on September 1, 1979, through August 31, 1980.

President White retired and was succeeded by a new President, Bill N. Lacy, on January 1, 1980. In May 1980, during the course of an informal union discussion in his office, President Lacy informed Eugene Tulchin, associate professor of art and union president, that since he was fairly new at Cooper Union he would really appreciate not opening up the whole contract and wished to extend the union contract for 1 year without any changes except for a salary reopener. Tulchin responded there might be some problems, made reference to the Supreme Court ruling in Yeshiva University which had issued in February 1980, and said he was reluctant merely to be left without any protections in a successor agreement. At Lacy's suggeston, Tulchin prepared proposed language representing the sense of the parties that the Cooper Union faculty did not fall under the definition of management as set forth in Yeshiva, and submitted a draft to Lacy, at a subsequent meeting, who said he would consider it.

When Tulchin left for Europe early in the summer of 1980, without resolution of the problem of the Union's concern for some protection from the impact of Yeshiva or other issues he had discussed with Lacy concerning the length of a new contract and salaries, he advised Lacy that Professor Wurmfelf and Thaddeus Gatza, a professor of humanities, treasurer, and member of the Union's executive board, were authorized to continue talks in his absence.

By letter dated June 9, 1980, the Union, by Wurmfeld, its secretary, informed Lacy of the availability of its negotiating team at any time after July 1, 1980, to begin negotiations. In a responsive letter dated June 26, 1980, Cooper Union, by Lacy for the first time, asserted the faculty's claimed managerial status as the basis for a decision not to meet for the purpose of negotiating a renewal of the present contract, thus effectively withdrawing recognition and refusing to bargain any longer with the Union. In the letter, Lacy stated, in part, "I have conducted an investigation into the applicability of the Yeshiva decision to Cooper Union, and I have conscientiously pondered the content of the Court's reasoning. As a result I have come to the conclusion that continued recognition of the [Union] under the [Act] is inconsistent not only with the law, but also with the conditions necessary to foster full faculty participation in policy making within the school."

In a later letter dated July 8, 1980, distributed to the faculty, Lacy amplified his views, concurred in by the board of trustees, which led him to the decision to withdraw recognition. He stated that part of the reason for his decision was the basic incompatibility and contradiction between the policy making role of the faculty and unionization. Lacy also noted that because of its size and special professional character, the faculty's managerial role was a precondition of quality education. This position was also asserted by Lacy in a meeting he held with faculty members Wurmfeld and Gatza the same day. On August 1, 1980, the charge which led to the issuance of the complaint herein was filed by the Union.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Cooper Union was founded by Peter Cooper as an educational institution before the Civil War. It was chartered in 1859 by an act of the New York State Legislature. It has always been maintained as a tuition-fee institution. Its operating funds are derived from gifts, grants, endowments, and the like. One major source of funding is the income derived from its ownership of real estate, both improved by buildings and unimproved, in the vicinity of the facilities and in midtown Manhattan.

The institution is located at Cooper Square, New York City, and consists of three buildings: the Foundation Building, the Hewitt Building, and the Engineering Building. Cooper Union also has maintained a facility called Green Camp at Ringwood, New Jersey. In the 1970s, the improved portion of this property was sold.

Peter Cooper's purpose in establishing Cooper Union, as set forth in its charter, was to create a school of design and engineering equal to the best schools "now established or, hereafter, to be established."

B. Organizational Structure of Cooper Union

The charter vests ultimate authority in a board of trustees, whose membership was fixed at 16 in bylaws adopted May 12, 1972. Three members are nominated by the Cooper Union Alumni Association. The remainder are nominated and elected by the board itself. Between regular meetings, held quarterly, and special meetings convened at the request of the chairman or on written request of any three trustees, its powers are exercised by an executive committee consisting of the chairman, the chief policy officer, and four trustees. Other committees include a finance committee, a nominating committee, and such other committees as may be created from time to time as deemed desirable.

The bylaws also provided for the establishment of various officers of the institution with prescribed duties who exercise their powers and duties with the approval of the trustees. They include a president, the chief executive officer, a vice president for business affairs, a secretary, a treasurer responsible for managing investments, a provost, the chief academic officer who exercises general supervisory power over the academic affairs and over the academic officers subject to the control of the president and trustees, an assistant secretary, and an assistant treasurer. The president and provost may, and the secretary shall, attend all meetings of the board. The president's duties include appointment or removal from offices, with the approval of the board, of such administrative officers, faculty, and staff as may be necessary and to prescribe the power and duties incident to such positions, with the approval of the board. He also may attend and vote at all committee meetings.

As described in the faculty policy manual, effective April 2, 1964, Cooper Union is organized in divisions: the Division of Adult Education, at that time the School of Art and Architecture, the School of Engineering, and at that time the Museum for the Arts of Decoration. The manual noted the School of Art and Architecture and School of Engineering offered curricula leading to baccalaureate degrees in architecture, engineering, fine arts and science. Evening sessions of the School of Art and Architecture offered programs leading to certificates in architecture and fine arts. Reference was made to a Division of Graduate Studies being established in the School of Engineering.

C. The 1964 Governances

The 1964 faculty policy manual is described in a foreword as a revision of the 1957 "Policies and Procedures for Teaching Personnel of the Cooper Union." It includes in appendices the governances of the then School of Art and Architecture and the School of Engineering. The preamble of the governances described them as documents defining the functions, rights, responsibilities, and authority of the faculty.

In article I, section 2, of each governance, the faculty is recognized as the professional group responsible, collectively and as individuals, for the educational programs of the respective school as approved by the trustees and interpreted by the president. The faculty shall exercise its responsibility by providing instructions, participating in committee work and administrative work associated with the instructional programs, fostering creative scholarship, advancing professional education, considering and acting on other matters of common academic interest, and advising the president.

The governances are noted as becoming effective on their approval by the board of trustees.

In article II, the membership of the faculty is defined as including the dean and his associate or assistant and three members of the adjunct teaching staff, in addition to all full-time faculty. Various administrators are listed as ex-officio members of each faculty and at meetings of the joint faculties. The respective deans of the two schools are chairmen of their respective faculties and the secretaries are to be elected by the respective faculties.

In article III, "Meetings," two regular meetings per academic year, in October and April, are specified. Special meetings may be called by the chairman acting on his own, and shall be called by him when voted by the faculty, petitioned for by three members, or requested by a standing committee or the president. Joint meetings of the faculties may be called by the president or by the deans of both schools acting under direction of the Senate. The president shall normally preside, and in his absence, the chairman of the Senate shall do so.

Article IV lists faculty duties and responsibilities as including implementation of the educational program and other matters itemized in article I, making recommendations for awarding degrees, and other honors and awards, and advising with respect to appointments and promotions. As to the latter responsibility, department heads, after consultation with members of the department, shall recommend a candidate to fill the staff vacancy. On a department head vacancy, the dean shall appoint a committee to include two members of professional rank to advise the dean, who shall recommend a candidate to the president. Acting department heads shall be named on the dean's recommendation after consultation with faculty.

Recommendation to select a new dean shall come from a committee consisting of all department heads and one member from each department, who shall prepare a list of qualified candidates for the president. To fill the office of president, a committee consisting of the deans, department heads of the two schools, and the business officer shall prepare a list of persons it deems qualified for the trustees, submitting specific recommendations at its request.

Article VI requires amendments be approved by a vote of two-thirds of the faculty.

D. Committees Under the Goverances

Standing committees include the administrative, curriculum, admissions, academic standards, calender and schedules, Student Activities, and Academic Freedom and Tenure, the latter two being joint committees for both schools. When elected by the faculty, a slate of nominees is to be prepared by the administrative committee and circulated to the faculty 2 weeks prior to the April meeting at which additional nominations may be made from the floor. Normally, each committee shall have three members, with the president and dean as ex-officio members. Standing committees report to the faculty, but may tender a report to the administrative committee for evaluation and guidance.

In addition to schoolwide and the two joint committees, the governances provide for an institutionwide body—the Senate. Under the 1964 governances, it consisted of the president, deans of the two schools, two members elected by the faculty of each school who shall be heads of departments, and one member elected by the four from a slate nominated by the president. The chairman and vice chairman are the two deans, alternating each year.

As described in the governances, the Senate shall concern itself with the study of goals, standards, and physical facilities. It shall study problems that involve the two schools and their relationship with other divisions. It shall also concern itself with educational trends, and with planning and development, and advise the president.

A review of the makeup and role of the standing committees under the 1964 governances now follows:

1. Administrative Committee

Membership to include dean as chairman, associate or assistant dean, heads of departments and director of evening session. Responsibility is for general administration of the operations of the school, and for matters not delegated to nor within the purview of other standing committees and shall serve as advisor to the dean.

In carrying out their duties of administration of financial and personnel matters, the activities of members of the committee shall reflect the interests of the faculty.

In addition, it may receive reports of standing committees, evaluate them, and make recommendations to the faculty for appropriate action.

It may also establish ad hoc committees of the faculty.

2. Curriculums Committee

Committee made up of heads of departments offering curriculum leading to degrees and director of evening session.

Its responsibility is for policies relating to the formulation of curriculums, and it shall approve new curriculums and major revisions of curriculums. It is also responsible for coordinating and planning revisions of curriculums.

The procedure for adoption of a curriculum is as follows: A proposal is prepared by the curriculum committee and forwarded to the administrative committee for its review and possible revision and then placed on the agenda of the next regular faculty meeting. If approved, it is transmitted to the president who, if he approves, shall notify the dean, and if he does not, shall return the proposal to the administrative committee with his comments.

If the president fails to act, on recommendation by the administrative committee, the Senate may make a direct approach to the board of trustees.

Minor revisions of curriculums involving changes of subject title, or substitution of subject in the same general subject-matter category, shall be acted on by the curriculum committee after consultation with appropriate department heads, and shall be effective after approval by the administrative committee.

3. Admissions Committee

Membership includes director of admissions and three members elected by the faculty.

It shall establish and continually review general principles with respect to admission of students under policies approved by the board of trustees and shall review administration of faculty rules and policy by the admissions office.

It shall also carry out long-range studies of the correlation between the admissions process and the success of students in curriculm departments. As an aid it may request necessary statistical studies by the admissions office.

4. Academic Standards Committee

Made up of one representative from each department of instruction. Three members elected to serve terms of 3 years. The dean of students and registrar are ex-officio members.

It is responsible for defining the grading system, recommending standards and regulations for academic performance, reviewing petitions from students, and recommending candidates for degrees.

As to grading system, academic standards, and regulations, it shall receive and consider individual faculty proposals for changes, submitting major changes for approval by the faculty and then the president. Minor changes, such as changes in wording for clarification, may be acted on by the committee and reported to the faculty.

The committee has final authority to take action on petitions for reinstatement from students who have resigned, withdrawn, or been dropped for failure to maintain required academic standards. In making decisions in this area, it shall be guided by the specific circumstances, potentional benefit to the student, and the currently existing state of enrollment.

In May, the committee receives from the registrar a list of candidates for graduation who have attained the necessary standing and have satisfied all other academic requirements in their respective courses. It reviews the list for possible addition or deletion and has final responsibility for certifying the candidates for graduation by a favorable vote by recommending their approval to a May faculty meeting.

5. Student Activities Committee

This committee is a joint one, made up of one member elected by Engineering and another by Art and Architecture, dean of students, and director of Green Camp. It shall prepare a policy, study, evaluate, and report periodically to the faculty on how the policy is meeting the needs of students and objectives of the institution.

6. Calendar and Schedules Committee

The committees of each school, acting jointly, are responsible for working out details of the calendar, consistent with requirements of accreditation agencies and taking into account special needs of other divisions and the institution's administrative offices, and coordinating schedules between the two schools.

A prospective calendar for the following academic year is presented to the faculty at a meeting in February. The calendar each committee finally adopts is forwarded to the Senate for final action.

The committee also prepares assignments of instructors to classes and schedules of day and evening classes based on information furnished by heads of departments.

7. Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee

It consists of four members having rank of professor or associate professor, with representation from both schools and elected by the joint faculties. The Senate prepares a slate of nominees for election.

Its first responsibility is to formulate and recommend to the joint faculties a code to be followed in proceedings concerning the fitness of a member of the faculty. In doing so, it shall be guided by the principles adopted jointly by the Association of American Colleges and the American Association of University Professors.

The code shall be submitted to the president for review by the Senate and transmitted to the board of trustees. Upon approval by all parties, it shall become official policy of Cooper Union.

Appendix III to the 1964 faculty policy manual sets forth principles and procedures concerning academic freedom and tenure. The document has as a stated purpose the ensuring of agreement on the procedural methods of preserving academic freedom and tenure rights. The preamble notes that the responsibility of formulating principles and policies that bear on the freedom and security of faculty members should be shared by both the faculty and the administration in order that the experience and wisdom of each may be utilized.

In a discussion as to acquisition of tenure, the manual notes that "The services of each faculty member on a probationary appointment should be evaluated by the Administration in order to determine whether he should be continued on a probationary appointment or be granted tenure." A maximum period of service required for achieving tenure is listed for each faculty rank, ranging from 7 years (for instructors) to 2 years (for professors).

Procedures regarding timing of notice of nonrenewal of a probationary appointment and provisions limiting dismissal of tenured faculty for adequate cause, as defined, are next set forth.

The document next describes procedures to be followed in hearings on dismissal of a faculty member or in cases of a claim of suppression of academic freedom by means other than threats of expulsion or unjust withholding of tenure or promotion. Provision is made for a hearing committee made up of the members of the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee. When either the administration or faculty member requests review of his dismissal as a member of the tenured faculty or probationary appointee, or claims other suppression of his academic freedom, the hearing committee should inquire informally into the situation, effecting an agreement if possible. Failing an agreement, the committee should determine whether, in its view, formal proceedings should be considered. A detailed hearing procedure is outlined, if formal proceedings result, on joinder of issue arising from the president's statement of grounds for dismissal and the faculty member's written response or in the case of a particular breach of academic freedom arising from the faculty member's claim and the administration's response. In case of dismissal the administration bears the burden of proof. Both parties may appear by representatives, present testimony, and confront adverse witnesses, and informal presentations may be made, by statement outside the hearing, where appropriate. The committee may proceed to decision with or without availability of the record. It should make explicit findings with respect to each ground of removal presented or means of alleged suppression of academic freedom. The committee's decision should be transmitted to the trustees by the president, and, according to the document, its acceptance would normally be expected. If the trustees do not sustain the hearing committee on the record of the proceeding, the matter should be returned to the committee with objections specified for its reconsideration.

E. Structural Changes in Organization of the Institution During the 1970s and Their Impact

During the 1970s, Cooper Union grappled with many of the problems facing institutions of higher learning in the United States resulting from growing inflation and increased costs, and the ongoing debate about the relevance and usefulness of the traditional colleges curricular and experience and proposals to modify the Cooper Union professional curriculum in art, architecture, and engineering. Furthermore, Cooper Union, as an institution specializing in engineering, architecture, and art education, but with a strong humanistic bent, has continually faced the issue of how to integrate the arts studies into its curriculum. This issue has raised a host of related questions having to do with the kinds of degrees the institution should grant, the number and content of required liberal arts studies, the placement of faculty teaching in the traditional liberal arts and science areas in its degree-granting schools, and the role such faculty should or may play in the goverance committee structure which as has been shown, has been structured on a school-by-school basis.

As early as 1965, the then called department of humanities, since 1961 located within the School of Engineering with its own chairman, was reorganized by assignment for administrative purposes to the president. In a memorandum dated November 5, 1965, directed to the deans and humanities chairman, the then president Richard F. Humphreys acknowledged that the manner in which the department of humanities can best participate in the organizational structures of the School of Art and Architecture and the School of Engineering and Science was a subject that was under discussion for many months. Humphreys next referred to the proposal he attached which Professor Haselton, humanities chairman, formulated "after consultation with his faculty." That process did not involve putting to a vote of the humanities faculty the proposal to reorganize their department.

Professor Thaddeus Gatza, professor of humanities in literature and music appreciation, testified that Professor Haselton presented to the faculty the proposal, the imminent occurrence of the change, but as a conclusion already reached. Besides the president assuming direct administration of the department, the members of the department were assigned to the two schools, with all rights, privileges, and responsibilities provided in the faculty policy manual, except the right to vote at meetings of the faculty. With respect to joint faculty committees and joint meetings of the faculties, the humanities faculty were entitled to full participation, including the right to vote and serve on all joint committees and the Senate.

By April 1969, Humphreys had died and an interim president, Henry T. Heald, was serving in his place. A complaint from the Humanities faculty to the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee that they had been disenfranchised by the 1965 reorganization was made to interim President Heald. By responsive letter to the committee dated April 16, 1969, Heald disputed that the AF&T Committee had jurisdiction and suggested, instead, that the way to improve the situation was by study and action with administration and faculty working together to develop a new program for the goverance of Cooper Union.

Heald was succeeded by new President John F. White later in 1969. After personally receiving complaints from the humanities faculty, he formed an ad hoc committee on structure to deal with this and other organizational problems. It included the deans of the two schools, some students, adjuncts, and members of the full-time faculty, all apparently appointed by the president to advise him, outside the goverance structure. By memorandum dated October 15, 1969, White, on behalf of himself and the trustees, advised that the Humanities faculty—five in Art and Architecture and seven in Engineering and Science—would immediately regain their vote and that another suggestion of the committee on structure to permit faculty and student representatives of a proposed new Senate to observe discussions of the board of trustees was approved for 1 academic year, limited to one faculty member and one student. The caveat was added that during trustee executive sessions representatives would be excluded.

On February 8, 1971, the board of trustees issued a policy statement entitled, "Cooper Union For the Seventies and Eighties." Among other groups whose input was acknowledged was the faculty through the Engineering and Science faculty advisory committee and the administrative committee of the School of Art and Architecture. At the same time, the trustees acknowledged that they had had the advisory services of Heald, Hobson and Associates, and a group of educators they had brought to the Cooper Union to assist in their assessment. Heald was the same educator who had recently a few years prior served as interim president. The policy statement examined and analyzed in depth the goals and aims of the institution and how they could best be achieved in light, in particular, of the present, and anticipated future, difficult financial situation, made more difficult because of its tuition-free operation. Among other changes proposed in engineering were revisions of the curriculum, requiring common first-year and almost totally common second-year studies, with design of individualized programs thereafter, increasing minimum class size to 35, adding a fifth year leading to a masters degree, and merging the present four departments into one division of engineering with a chairman appointed by the dean and president from a slate of two to four selected by tenured members of the division. Science and mathematics curriculum were to be consolidated, with a single bachelor of science degree offered, graduate study in those areas to be eliminated, and the physics, math, and chemists in the present chemical engineering faculty merged into a single science and math division. Recognizing the limited size and scope of social science and humanities offerings and that they provide a service and not studies leading to a degree, the trustees proposed the present humanities department become the Division of Humanities and Social Sciences and become a part of the faculty in the School of Engineering and Science, with a chairman chosen in the same way as those of engineering and science and mathematics.

For students in Art and Architecture the report urged a minimum 30 credit hours in the humanities and social sciences, with 18 of these being electives, and the students be permitted to take science, math, and engineering courses. The trustees also concluded that the architecture department be merged with painting and Sculpture and Photography and Design.

The trustees also urged development of a single governance for this entire faculty, with the Senate changed to include a faculty each from art and architecture, engineering, science, and math and one from the humanities faculty, and three students each from art and architecture, engineering, science and math, and humanities.

Prior to the issuance of the trustees' statement, the Faculty Advisory Committee of the School of Engineering and Science, chaired by Stephen Haselton, who was also chairman of humanities, and staffed by seven other faculty, two of whom were department heads, and the dean had issued its own lengthy report on January 22, 1971.

A major recommendation of this committee was a new academic administrative structure reconstituting the faculties into three divisions: a Division of Engineering, a Division of Art and Architecture, and a Division of Sciences and Liberal Arts. The new division would include all members of the present Departments of humanities, mathematics, physics, and physical education, together with pure chemists. Each division was to be administered by a faculty member elected by members of his division or rotating for a stated term who would report to a single appointed administrative officer (dean, provost, or vice president). The basic administration of the educational program in each major field of study would be handled by a standing committee of the faculty with its own elected chairman.

By open letter from the department of humanities to the trustees and president dated March 31, 1971, signed by 11 of the 12 humanities faculty, including Haselton, the members expressed strong criticism of the trustees' characterization of them as being unable to develop and teach a proper elective program and of the proposal, claimed most damaging (and contrary to the faculty advisory committee's recommendation), of withdrawing the humanities department from the School of Art and Architecture and placing it wholly within the school of Engineering and Science. The Humanities faculty reminded the trustees that 6 years before they were removed from the same administrative position now proposed and urgently advised the trustees to reconsider and continue the present administrative location of the department, now approximately divided in its membership between the two professional schools.

After it appeared to Chairman Haselton that the trustees had disregarded and would continue to disregard the report and recommendation of the faculty advisory committee and at the same time the trustees and outside consultants and advisors had been working on a plan without his knowledge (or that of other faculty) which was clearly going to be followed, he resigned at the end of the 1970–1971 academic year.

By memorandum dated October 9, 1972, the board of trustees informed the Cooper Union community of their decisions about the development of the institution in the coming period. They broke down into three areas. Regarding structure, the present School of Art and Architecture would consist of two divisions, Art and Architecture, and the School of Engineering and Science would consist of two divisions, Engineering, including all members of engineering departments except chemists, and Science and Mathematics, including all members of departments of physics and math plus the chemists. A fifth division of Humanities and Social Sciences would consist of all present members of the department of humanities, who would continue to be represented on the faculties of the two schools as at present. Two to four candidates to become division heads would be recommended by the faculty to the deans of the respective schools, for appointment by the president before December 1, 1972, for a term of 3 years. The division heads would thereafter convene meetings of their respective divisions to organize internal structure, present curriculum proposals to appropriate faculty, and handle other matters. Division heads were also to make budget and personnel recommendations to the respective deans in conjunction with current department heads after consultation with relevant faculty members.

Since the preexisting academic departments had now been consolidated into five divisions, the position of department head was abolished. According to Professor Knapp the loss of department heads and the departmental structure meant a loss in local professional faculty control over many details of the day-to-day administration of the curriculum. Previously, faculty in each subject academic department had input in establishing a laboratory budget, local control over laboratory technicians who were assigned, or at least, associated with particular laboratories in particular disciplines, the services of a local departmental secretary, continuous coordination with other departmental members in developing changes and modifications in curriculum, and day-to-day involvement in housekeeping matters relating to the academic department. All of these local controls and direct participation in subject curriculum were lost on the elimination of the department setup. Faculty concern with and criticism of the changes wrought in 1972 have been continuously voiced in informal groups and directly with the dean over the subsequent 10-year period, particularly in Engineering, but to no avail.

As to degrees and curricula, new degrees to be offered would be a B.S. with a major in the various engineering options; a B.S. with a major in mathematics; a B.S. With a major in distributed science; and a B.S. with a major in architecture. Curriculum proposals for these degrees were to originate in the relevant divisions for presentation to the appropriate faculties at the earliest possible time following appointment of the division heads.

Regarding governance, the trustees wrote that the Senate would be asked to form a committee to draft a new governance in keeping with the new structure. On the report of the committee, the Senate was to propose the governance to the faculty and the trustees for approval.

Associate Professor of Architecture Michael Wurmfeld testified without contradiction that when these structural changes took place effective for the academic year 1973–1974, the faculty did not participate in recommending or voting as a body on them. Wurmfeld stated that the structure was changed by a memorandum from the president. The faculty of which he was a member—of the School of Art and Architecture—did not vote to make the change for departments to divisions, nor did it recommend the change, nor did any governance committee deal with the matter. Neither did the faculty of Architecture—when it became a separate division—vote to recommend John Hejduk as division head of Architecture, although he had been department head of architecture prior to the change.

In June 1973, at a meeting of the faculty of the then School of Art and Architecture, under consideration were amendments to the governance which had been prepared by the administrative committee after having received recommendations from the ad hoc committee on governance, appointed by the dean. One of the proposed amendments provided that when there is a vacancy in the post of division head (the position newly created by the trustees), a committee predominated by full-time faculty shall prepare a list of qualified candidates for the dean; the president and dean shall then present a slate to the members of the faculty, who shall elect the head of the division by a majority. When the post of division head is unfilled for an interval, the dean, in consultation with members of the division, shall promptly recommend to the president a member of the division to serve as acting division head.

Provost Kaplan spoke against the amendment, believing that the position differed from department head and the ultimate choice should be by the administration. By letter dated September 13, 1973, White informed Dean Sadek of the School of Art and Architecture that the trustees, at its September 12, 1973 meeting, approved the amendments to the governance previously submitted, with the exception of the one concerning division head. The trustees specifically disapproved the amendment dealing with the method of appointment, believing that while the appointee should be acceptable to both the faculty and the administration, "the level of administrative and academic responsibility of the position is such that the appointment should be made by the President, after consultation with the dean, from a slate presented by appropriate members of the faculty."

As a consequence of the administration's rejection of the faculty's proposal, now including the division head as an administrator, the makeup of the curriculum committee of the School of Art and Architecture after adoption of the 1973 amendments included only one full-time faculty member.

After Haselton left the institution, Humanities Professor Leo Kaplan was appointed by White as acting head of the department of humanities to succeed him. While Kaplan had informal faculty support for the position, he was named without faculty vote. Then, in April 1972, Kaplan was named as the institution's first provost and academic vice president by the board of trustees. The position of provost was created, and Professor Kaplan was selected to fill it, without any consultation with, recommendation or vote by, the faculties of Cooper Union.

When the Division of Humanities and Social Sciences was created in 1972, Professor Raymond Brown was appointed its acting chairman. By memorandum dated May 21, 1973, the members of the faculty of the division unanimously recommended Brown as the permanent chairman after a report and recommendation of a department search committee headed by Humanities Professor Richard Bowman. That recommendation was never followed by the administration.

In May 1973, Provost Kaplan presented a report he had prepared to the Senate, since 1971 made up of student and faculty representatives as recommended by the trustees. In it, Kaplan presented quantitative data bearing on possible policy decisions to be taken because of mounting deficits and the need to economize to assure the continued viability of the institution. Kaplan had been asked by White to prepare a report outlining his thoughts on optimizing the allocation of Cooper Union's limited resources while cutting costs without sacrificing quality. Key factors examined were (1) student-faculty ratios, (2) class size, (3) teaching loads, and (4) tenure. Kaplan saw the possibility of a reasonable increase in the student-faculty ratio, particularly in Engineering and Science where a combination of dropping enrollment and faculty increases had led to more than a 15-percent increase in the ratio. In light of the marked increase in proportions of class sections of exceptionally small size over the last decade, Kaplan saw some improvement likely in judiciously combining small sections but little likelihood in avoiding small classes in a small school offering an appropriate variety of courses. Kaplan was hopeful that real savings could be accomplished through increasing teaching loads for full-time faculty, many of whom no longer had administrative duties as department heads since their abolition on the 1972 reorganization into divisions. On tenure, Kaplan was convinced the data on the ratios, class size, and teaching loads reinforced the position recently taken by the board of trustees severely limiting grants of tenure if any meaningful reduction in the proportion of faculty on tenure was to be achieved while reducing the absolute size of the faculty. Kaplan suggested that policy should continue over a 5-year period.

In sum, Kaplan recommended reducing full-time equivalent faculty between 10 and 15 by attrition over the next 5-year period without replacement of retiring faculty and increasing teaching loads; a severe policy on granting of tenure over the same period; and reasonable, selective increases in class size on a case-by-case basis.

The provost insisted on the witness stand that before preparation of his report, he had held many discussions with individual faculty members, particularly senior members in Humanities, on limiting full-time faculty and increasing hiring of adjuncts, and with many people, he had raised the subject of teaching loads, particularly asking members of the Humanities Department if they could tolerate an increase in load. Nevertheless, at no point in his report does Kaplan acknowledge any input from faculty in his discussion and resolution of the issues raised in light of the analyzed data. Neither did Kaplan claim that his own recommendations were previously disclosed to the faculty.

The Senate continued discussions on the report into the 1973–1974 academic year. By that point it had become obvious to a number of the faculty members of the Senate that the recommendations in the report were already in the process of being implemented. When this was brought to Kaplan's attention the provost responded that he thought the Senate could be useful by a resolution that would advocate support of the recommendations made that were being implemented. Various faculty members, among them Professor of Electrical Engineering Ralph Knapp, then a member of the Senate, stated objections to being put in the position of being a rubber stamp to an action that was already being put into effect.

Thus, at a Senate meeting held December 18, 1973, a first draft of a resolution for adoption by the Senate prepared by its chairman, Richard Bowman, was circulated for discussions. It noted at the beginning of its preamble: "The major difficulty in preparing this resolution is that the Senate is being asked now to advise on actions previously adopted by Trustees and Administration without consulting the Senate." As an example, the preamble went on to note that although the Faculty was told no teaching jobs would be lost because of adoption of the new divisional structure, a considerable credibility gap was created when subsequently eight well-thought-of teachers were denied tenure. Further noted was the sacrifice of a uniquely favorable financial position by the $10 million renovation of the Foundation Building rather than following spendthrift education practices. The preamble continues: "The Faculties, too, have felt that they were greeted by ukase from on high, rather than playing a responsible part in decision making."

The draft resolution went on to recommend more study and consultation prior to diminishing the size of the faculty by 1 to 15 members; to recommend a need for the Senate to increase its competence in studying balance sheets and financial reports in order to offer competent advice on the data compiled by Provost Kaplan (a Senate request for an administration-supplied accountant to aid its study of the provost's report had been rejected); to dispute an increase in teaching load which did not take into account other needs, such as for diversification of faculty and participation in committee work; and to reject any increase in class size because of a resulting decrease in variety of courses offered. The draft concluded with language highly critical of the apparent adoption by the trustees of the provost's report calling for more discussion in a variety of areas, including the dangers and desirability of restricted tenure policy, effective decision making by trustees in academic areas, standard fiscal approach to educational policy in a free tuition private college, converting faculty into predominantly adjunct part-time status, violating governance and having no new governance, and continuing the dichotomy of the Cooper Union in two uncooperating and misunderstanding professional schools.

By the senate meeting of March 5, 1974, the issue of collective bargaining had been interjected and predominated in the Senate's consideration of a response to the provost's May 1973 report. When Bowman's December 1973 draft resolution came up for continued consideration, Senator Tulchin urged the Senate to consider and endorse the concept of collective bargaining in dealing with the various issues raised in the provost's report. After a ruling by the chairman that consideration of the matter was in order, Senator Knapp, at the request of several senators, distributed materials announcing the formation of the CUFCT, a meeting of its organizing committee held in February, and a collective-bargaining election petition. On a motion made by Tulchin, seconded by Knapp, and subsequently rephrased following discussion, the Senate adopted by a vote of seven in favor, none opposed, and one abstention, the following resolution, proposed as an addition to Bowman's original draft resolution:

> The Senate recommends to the faculties and notifies the administration that the issues raised in the Provost's May 1973 report should be dealt with in the formal procedures of collective bargaining.

During consideration of the motion, both Dean Sadek of the School of Art and Architecture and Dean Volpe of the School of Engineering and Science questioned the legality of their presence during the debate and excused themselves from the meeting.

It is thus apparent that the economic problems confronting the institution in the early 1970s as well as the provost's report, unilaterally prepared, issued, and implemented, dealing with these problems in terms of restricting tenure and increasing adjunct faculty and teaching loads crystallized faculty discontent with administration handling of these concerns with limited and belated faculty input to the point of encouraging faculty collective bargaining on the one hand and energizing the Senate to serve as a focal point of faculty sentiment for an independent and effective faculty voice on broad academic policy and structure on the other hand. The interest in collective bargaining led almost immediately to the filing of the representation petition and to the lengthy bargaining history following union certification and ultimately to the initial contract entered in 1978. As will be seen, in 1979 the CUFCT played a significant role in a later continued restructuring of the institution involving in particular the place and relationship to other faculty of the Humanities members. The faculty interest in strengthening the role of the 1972 revamped faculty-student Senate continued to be frustrated when a subsequent reorganization of the institution announced in 1975 was implemented without consultation with it, and its voluntary involvement in a matter of alleged breach of academic freedom in the case of Professor Gormley also in 1975 led to White's rejection of its role in the matter. White also expressed the view at a meeting of the Senate held March 4, 1975, that the faculty policy manual did not require that the president must consult with the Senate or that he must agree with the Senate's recommendations. As a consequence of these continued defeats in making its voice heard in matters of significance in academic and financial policy areas, the Senate at a meeting held December 2, 1975, adopted a motion that since it was a group without any powers it should cease to meet any longer. No further Senate meetings were held until after adoption of the 1978 collective-bargaining agreement.

In a memorandum dated November 15, 1973, White addressed faculty and students about his concern that the trustees report for the seventies and eighties which had been designed to open a dialogue about the future role of the institution had not led to a resolution of the continuing issues still troubling it. Chief among them was the place of the liberal arts, social science, and other general education features in the professional curriculum and the administrative, organizational, and structural relationships between them. Since conflict and irrationality continued to mark the faculty's consideration of these concerns, the president now assigned the provost to undertake a thorough study of the general education program. To assist him, he also appointed a special committee under the provost's chairmanship, consisting of the two academic deans and the five division heads. Their charge was to develop a philosophy and rationale of general education in the professional curricula, to outline the general principles of an appropriate curricula approach to achieve it, and to recommend an effective organization, structural relationship, and administration of this program within Cooper Union. Their report should have been available for the faculties and president and trustees by early in the 1974–1975 academic year. The president urged all persons and groups of the Cooper community to communicate their views to the committee.

In view of the charge of the president's special committee, Architecture Professor Michael Wurmfeld had serious reservations about accepting the chairmanship of the Curriculum Committee of the School of Art and Architecture at its meeting held November 19, 1973. He believed that the president's announcement of November 15 precluded a review by the faculty of the humanities curriculum, and, in fact, constituted an improper superseding of the authority vested by the governances in the curriculum committee. Professor Wurmfeld sought clarification of the work of the curriculum committee from Dean Sadek. The dean stated that the three representatives from the School of Art and Architecture on the president's special committee would be bound by the recommendations of the A&A curriculum committee, and that the A&A curriculum committee should concern itself with what it believes are the general studies requirements within professional programs and how a complimentary program can be developed for the degree requirements, leaving for the special committee the questions of organization, structural relationship, and administration.

By memorandum dated January 23, 1975, White announced a further reorganization of the institution and elimination of certain programs. He referred to consultation and discussion involving every part of the Cooper community of ways of overcoming its serious financial problems which had taken place for at least the past 5 years. He noted discussions with the faculty as a whole beginning with the 1970s and 1980s report, and in the Senate, but without any positive cost-cutting plans being proposed or endorsed. He made no mention of the report of work or his special committee of administrators appointed November 15, 1973. The decisions taken by the trustees were as follows:

I. Programs

A. Cooper Union will discontinue immediately the admission of students to curricula leading to degrees in mathematics, physics, and distributed science. Current third and fourth year students in those disciplines will be permitted to fulfill academic requirements and will be granted Cooper Union degrees. Current first and second year students in these programs may continue through the 1975–76 academic year and will be offered the option of transferring into the School of Engineering, subject only to the condition that choice of a particular engineering curriculum will be limited by the maximum number that can reasonably be absorbed.

B. Effective July 1, 1976, the physical education program will be discontinued. A limited health program will be continued and those activities will be reassigned to the Office of Student-Services.

II. Organization

Effective July 1, 1975, the Cooper Union will consist of three degree-granting schools, each with a dean as its responsible administrative officer:

Art	George Sadek
Architecture	John Hejduk
Engineering	Chor Weng Tan

Each of the above degree-granting faculties will have primary responsibility, as usual, for such matters as curriculm, faculty status, academic standards, granting of degrees, admissions, and so forth.

In addition, the Faculty of Liberal Arts and Science—including art and architecture history, science and mathematics, humanities and social sciences—will provide the necessary academic studies in these disciplines as required by the three degree-granting schools in their several curricula. Provost Leo S. Kaplan will serve temporarily as acting dean of this faculty. It is essential that adequate representation from the Faculty of Liberal Arts and Sciences be provided on the relevant committees of the degree-granting schools so that the vital cooperation needed to optimize our educational efforts can be realized. The current elected student and alumni representatives should also be assigned to appropriate committees of the several schools for the same reason.

It will also be necessary to start work immediately on an overall governance for the Cooper Union in order to incorporate these changes and to provide a codified format for the required all-Cooper Union committees. Meanwhile, those committees now in existence, e.g. the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee, will continue to function as constituted.

III. Other Reductions

In conjunction with the changes announced above, major curtailment of expenditures will be effected throughout every section of activity within The Cooper Union. [Emphasis added.]

President White went on to note that the decisions he was announcing were taken after a great deal of agonizing and soul searching but that they represented, in his opinion and that of the trustees, what was absolutely essential to continue the school in a form consistent with its historic past.

Humanities Professor Thaddeus Gatza recalled one meeting which members of the humanities faculty held with President White during the 1974–1975 academic year relating to the status of humanities curriculum at Cooper Union. This was during the year in which the math and science degree programs were eliminated and the faculty of Liberal Arts and Science was created.

President White asked members present to express their views about the position of the faculty of Liberal Arts and Science and Chemistry Professor Avi Kornblum asked White if the administration had considered the possibility of having Cooper Union Engineering School students take their nonprofessional courses in humanities, physics, chemistry, and mathematics at another institution such as New York University because Cooper Union already had a relationship with it. As Professor Gatza noted, this would, in effect, be doing away with the faculty of Liberal Arts and Science at Cooper Union. President White replied that the administration had considered that possibility. It considered it in economic terms, and found that it was cheaper to retain the present faculty, and have students take their courses at the Cooper Union than have them take them elsewhere, and perhaps have Cooper Union pay for the tuition for those courses. Professor Kornblum asked in effect whether their jobs were in jeopardy, and White said no, as long as it was determined that they were cheaper labor than was available outside. The faculty never considered nor did the administration ever propose that the faculty consider whether it was economical to have students take courses at NYU and eliminate faculty members.

With respect to the terms of the 1975 reorganization, Provost Kaplan confirmed that the faculty was opposed to the termination of the degree program in mathematics among others but that the board of trustees, the provost, and president all recommended its elimination and it was eliminated.

After sophomore students in physics complained to the administration they were permitted to continue in the physics degree-granting program along with the juniors and seniors. Freshmen students in the degree-granting program of the physics department were ultimately permitted to transfer to the School of Engineering, mostly into the electrical engineering curriculum.

Electrical Engineering Professor Knapp and Humanities Professor Thaddeus Gatza confirmed that there had been no faculty input into the trustees' determination announced by President White to terminate the physics, math, and distributed science degree programs. At a regular faculty meeting of the School of Engineering and Science held on March 11, 1975, a motion was adopted by a vote of 18 to 7 in which the faculty expressed criticism to the president and trustees as to their decision to discontinue degree programs, describing the unilateral actions taken with negligible faculty consultation as serious violations of generally accepted standards of college governance and a breach of Cooper Union's own governance. The faculty called upon the trustees and the administration to suspend the decisions annouced and to initiate intensive discussions among all segments of the Cooper Union community to seek viable ways of meeting the current crises. The resolutions were not acted upon by the administration.

The minutes of the Senate meeting of February 4, 1975, contain a paragraph relating to President White's January 23, 1975 memorandum. In it, Chairman Bowman stated that "the administration had no consultation whatever with the Senate concerning the 23 January memorandum. No disagreement with this statement by the Chairman was voiced. All senators participated in the far ranging discussion." By memorandum dated March 12, 1975, and addressed to Senate Secretary Jamell Ahmad, Provost Kaplan sought to correct the minute's references to the Senate's consideration of the president's announcement of reorganization and program eliminations. Kaplan, referring to his own statement at the Senate meeting, stated that "it was a matter of interpretation, to say the least, as to whether there had been consultation." Kaplan went on to note the consultations on academic and financial questions which had taken place over a period of years between all groups at the Cooper Union, including trustees, administration, faculty, students, the Senate, AAUP, etc., as well as alumni, and expert consultants. The provost did not claim that the specific changes in organization and degree-granting subjects made effective July 1, 1975, had been the subject of any prior notice to, or consultation with, the Senate or any other faculty body.

Prior to the 1975 changes, the Art history faculty had been located in the School of Art and Architecture and the professors of physics, mathematics, and chemistry had been in the School of Engineering. The new faculty of Liberal Arts and Science comprised 26 of the 58 total full-time faculty complement in the whole institution. These 26 faculty members played no role in the creation of their new body. They were now excluded from membership on the committees of the three degree-granting schools, and had no vote in the meetings of the faculties of those schools.

The new faculty of Liberal Arts and Science, without governance, periodically held their own meetings, initially chaired by the acting dean, Provost Kaplan. After objections were raised to the existence of the faculty and the provost's role by the third meeting, the group elected Professor Julius Klerer as acting head and he called meetings subsequently.

ing for December 9, 1975, the agenda for which included the selection of an academic standards committee, designation of representatives to other faculties as requested by them, and selection of a secretary of the faculty. At the meeting, the members present voted by a one vote margin to place other items on the agenda relating to the structure and positions of the LA&S faculty ahead of Kaplan's. As he had another engagement, he left. A few days later, by memorandum dated December 12, 1975, Acting Dean Kaplan informed the faculty that in order to serve the current needs for a committee on academic standards he had appointed four faculty members he then named to serve temporarily in this capacity.

At a meeting of the Liberal Arts and Science faculty held on February 17, 1976, a resolution was adopted by a vote of 15 to 0, without dissent, which criticized the administration for continuing as acting dean its chief bargainer in dealings with the Union, thereby creating a conflict of interest in which the provost is supposed to exercise independent judgment in articulating the needs and recommendations of his faculty and also at the same time the positions of the administration in bargaining. The resolution recommended appointment of a new dean in consultation with the LA&S faculty. This resolution was ignored and the provost continued as acting dean until 1979 when the faculty of Liberal Arts and Science was dissolved, the science and mathematics faculty were returned to the School of Engineering, and the humanities and art history faculty became the department of humanities with their own chairman.

At another meeting of the LA&S faculty held on March 23, 1976, another resolution was adopted by a vote of seven in favor, two opposed, with two abstentions, which urged the administration to restore the status quo ante of including the members of the newly created faculty in the degree-granting schools with full rights of participation in governance committees. The initial paragraph of the resolution noted that the so-called faculty of Liberal Arts and Science "was created by fiat as a repository of the disenfranchised, with neither consultation nor the processes of mutual cooperation which should characterize academic decision making; the group having no status in the Faculty Governances and its members having no legitimate institutional functions." The faculty also resolved to attend all meetings of the faculty and committees to which they were previously assigned or elected and to continue fully to participate and vote in fulfillment of their academic responsibilities. There was no administration response to this resolution.

There were subsequently proposals in the form of memoranda forwarded to the deans of the three respective schools and through them to the respective faculties to have the LA&S faculty members included as voting members on the committees of the degree-granting schools to which they had been previously assigned. Chemists and mathematicians sought reassignment to Engineering, and the rest of the humanities faculty sought full reinstatement divided between the two other schools. These requests were also ignored.

Finally, on November 23, 1976, the LA&S faculty approved, by a vote of six to none with one abstention, a draft governance. This proposal was likewise ignored by the administration. The anomaly here was that only a faculty already covered by a governance could amend a governance provision by a vote of two-thirds of its members, subject to approval by the board of trustees. Since the newly created LA&S faculty had no standing under the existing governances, and they were not added to the governance when created by the administration, the members themselves lacked the authority to add themselves as a unit to the governance structure.

At the same time that the members of the newly created faculty started protesting their exclusion from the governance and full participation in the faculty deliberative processes, the dean of the School of Engineering took unilateral action to bring that school's governance into conformity with his view of the structural changes made since 1972 and to reconstitute certain committees which reflected abandoned titles.

In a memorandum dated September 18, 1975, Dean Tan reconstituted his school's committees, without invoking the governance amendment process, in light of the recent restructuring and until the governance was finally revised or rewritten. Certain committees, admissions, academic standards, Student Activities, calendar and schedules, and Academic Freedom and Tenure, he formed, as he put it, "in reasonable agreement with the Governance in terms of the new school organization." Since the heads of departments no longer existed, he found it impossible to form two other standing committees—administrative and curriculum—and, instead, announced he was appointing an interim curriculum committee to act on pressing academic matters and assumed the day-to-day administrative responsibilities himself. When special administrative matters arose, he would either convene the entire faculty for a meeting or appoint another interim committee to deal with the issues.

Since the governances were not formally revised thereafter until President Lacy issued new ones in 1981 (except insofar as the 1978 collective-bargaining agreement contained terms and conditions of employment in effect superseding related governance provisions), Dean Tan's unilateral governance amendments continued in effect to 1981.

According to Professor Knapp, whose testimony in this regard was not contested, certain significant changes were made by Dean Tan in the 1964 governance. For one thing, the terms of office of the members of the newly constituted committees were to be for 1 year or until the governance was finally revised, whichever came first, whereas the earlier terms had been for 3 years. The admissions committee now had alumni representation, without vote, a change from before. The academic standards committee which had apparently added two students since 1964 did not specify whether they had a vote although in the preexisting governance they had none. The faculty members were now listed as representing disciplines, not departments. Student Activities, a joint committee, was now listed as containing among faculty one member from Engineering and one from either Art or Architecture, instead of one from Engineering and one from Art and Architecture. The Committee on Academic Freedom and Tenure, another joint committee previously comprising four members elected from Engineering and Art and Architecture by the joint faculties, now listed seven faculty members who had tenure and two adjunct members with at least three from the School of Art and Architecture and at least three from the School of Engineering and faculty of Liberal Arts and Sciences. The interim curriculum committee now listed the dean as chairman, and contained one representative from each of the degree programs in the School of Engineering; two from the faculty of LA&S, one of whom shall be in mathematics or science and the other in humanities and social science; two students elected by the School of Engineering student council; and two alumni. Whether students and alumni could vote was not disclosed. Neither were represented on the original 1964 committee, which comprised only heads of departments with the chairman presumably selected from among their number.

On August 22, 1975, President White individually wrote eight tenured professors, formally notifying them that as a result of the discontinuance of several of the institution's academic programs, their appointments on the faculty of Cooper Union were terminated effective August 31, 1976. Five of the professors made written request on October 28, 1975, for a hearing pursuant to the principles and procedures concerning academic freedom and tenure as set forth in appendix III of the faculty policy manual. It appears that the request was made directly to the Committee on Academic Freedom and Tenure, which constitutes the hearing Committee once the AF&T committee makes a recommendation for formal proceedings approved by the president. By letter dated November 13, 1975, President White denied their requests for a hearing, stating that "it is our considered opinion that the action of the Board of Trustees to eliminate degree programs in Mathematics, Physics, and Distributed Science was exclusively within its area of responsibility," and that, accordingly, a hearing under these circumstances is neither appropriate nor required by the terms of the governance. The committee to which the request for hearing had been made did not respond, and, according to Professor Knapp, the matter was taken out of their hands by President White before they responded.

On denial of a hearing, the five professors brought suit in the Supreme Court, New York County, State of New York, against Cooper Union (Baker v. Cooper Union of Science and Art), alleging that they were entitled to an injunction against their terminations until they were granted a hearing pursuant to article III of the manual to determine whether their terminations were for adequate cause. Cooper Union moved for summary judgment dismissing the complaint on the ground there was no triable issue of fact and that it was entitled to judgment as a matter of law. President White submitted an affidavit in support of the motion.

In addition to asserting that the discontinuance of the programs was not a "change in academic program" within the definition of "adequate cause for dismissal" in appendix III, but, rather, involved the elimination of three entire academic degree-awarding programs, President White, in his affidavit, referred to two other proceedings in which the institution's unilateral authority to take this action was upheld. In one, the Acting Regional Director for Region 2 of the NLRB dismissed a charge filed by the CUFCT on February 5, 1979, claiming that Cooper Union was required to negotiate with it prior to making the decision to eliminate the programs. In this dismissal letter dated April 23, 1975, the Acting Regional Director stated, inter alia, "It appears that the decision by the Employer to restructure the College and discontinue certain educational programs was an entrepreneurial decision and therefore not one that required prior bargaining with your organization," citing General Motors Corp., 191 NLRB 951 (1971). Other, unrelated allegations were also dismissed by the Acting Regional Director in the same letter. The General Counsel's Office of Appeals denied an appeal from the refusal to issue complaint. In the other proceeding, a justice of the same court dismissed an action brought by Cooper Union students in the eliminated programs and alumni seeking to enjoin the program eliminations until the affected students obtained their degrees, the court recognizing that the trustees' decision was a proper exercise of its powers.

In the Baker suit, Cooper Union's motion for summary judgment was granted. After concluding that the appendix III hearing procedures do not apply to plaintiffs' situation, the court noted that even assuming plaintiffs had a right to a hearing, it would result at most in an advisory, nonbinding recommendation to the trustees. The court also referred to Cooper Union's "Charter and Indenture" under which it is the trustee's function to determine whether, when, and what programs should be offered or eliminated and their exclusive right to determine how the objects and purposes for which Cooper Union was established are to be implemented. The court added that "in point of fact, the Trustees have often eliminated or implemented programs in the past without first consulting any other group at Cooper Union. In the past fifteen years many similar changes have been made exclusively by the Trustees."

Among the other tenured professors terminated by letter on the restructuring and program eliminations, Professor of Physical Education Stephen P. Baker was subsequently reemployed as the director of health and recreation. The faculty neither participated nor voted on the decision to terminate Baker or the others, nor did it vote on Baker's subsequent appointment.

By memorandum dated May 22, 1978, addressed to the full-time faculty, President White dealt with the continuing problem of the administrative structure and organizational location of the current faculty of Liberal Arts and Science. He referred to a December 1977 request from the academic deans, the provost, and himself to Professor Bowman to poll the faculty in the hope a generally acceptable administrative solution could be achieved. The president then described two resolutions adopted by the faculty at a special meeting held in April 1978. The first recommended incorporation of its members into the degree-granting schools in varying and seemingly contradictory numbers, and the second proposed establishing the LA&S faculty as a nondegree-granting faculty and appointing four members each to the Art and Architecture faculties and nine members to the Engineering faculty.

The president went on to describe three other suggestions as to placement, participation, and structure made to him in the course of subsequent meetings be held with the several faculty groups. These groups comprised in all 35 members of the Cooper faculties, including 10 from Engineering, 5 each from the faculties of Art and Architecture, and 15 of the presently constituted faculty of LA&S. The president next summarized the weight of opinion of each group toward the five proposals, concluding that a commonly supported solution was impossible to achieve at this time. President White found this regrettable and even harmful to the prospects for collegiality and a common purpose search for solutions. He stated that in the absence of a coming together with the faculty on this matter, ultimately an administrative decision must be made. He tabled further consideration of the matter until the fall when he would reraise it with the hope that the differences between the several faculty groups could be resolved.

Associate Professor of Art and Union President Eugene Tulchin testified that pursuant to article XXV, "Meetings," of the collective-bargaining agreement, effective March 1978, he had been meeting regularly with Provost Kaplan. That article provided that the president of Cooper Union, or a designee, and the president of the CUFCT, or a designee, shall meet at least once each month to discuss and consult on matters affecting the terms and conditions of employment of bargaining unit members and on any other matters related to the agreement, unless both parties agree that no meeting should take place in any particular month.

Along with issuance of President White's report to the faculty in May 1978, on the continuing unresolved problems involving the LA&S faculty, union members among that faculty were complaining to Tulchin that they were disenfranchised and without a vote in the faculties and requested him to do something now that they had a union contract.

At one of their monthly meetings, Provost Kaplan told Tulchin that he really did not want to be the acting dean of the LA&S faculty and would love to be relieved. In the light of the president's memo, the union members' expressions of concern for their participatory exclusion, and the Provost's desire to be relieved of his responsibility, Tulchin now asked Kaplan if he was amenable to working with the Union in solving this problem. The Provost said he was.

Tulchin next obtained permission from the Union's executive board to pursue this matter. At his next meeting with the provost, they agreed to proceed to seek a solution together and to keep their discussions completely off the record. Tulchin asked Kaplan what absolute conditions he needed to have that were not negotiable, so that he would try and work out a solution incorporating that. The provost said one condition would be that the humanities group be an identifiable entity, and a second condition was that the president would appoint a person to be in charge of that group. Beyond that, the provost said he was open to suggestions. Tulchin stated he did not believe Kaplan's absolute needs were unreasonable or impossible to comply with and he went on to offer several suggestions to the resolution of the problem.

Tulchin's ideas were discussed and, ultimately, agreement was reached on the following terms. The science faculty would return to the School of Engineering and be assigned to that faculty; the other faculty members would be assigned to the faculty of the School of Art, School of Architecture, and School of Engineering in numbers that would be reasonably equitable relative to the numbers of full-time faculty in each of those schools; and the person responsible for the humanities area would be a member of the bargaining unit. On this last item, the union position, as expressed by Tulchin, had been that if the person to head the humanities was from within the institution, and it was a full-time administrative position, the Union wanted an additional instructor hired to replace the successful candidate, but that if no replacement was to be hired, then the position would be bargaining unit work, and the occupant would be included in the unit. Kaplan replied at a subsequent meeting that Cooper Union did not wish to go outside and hire a full-time person, nor did it wish to hire a full-time faculty member to substitute, and then agreed that the person to head this area would be included in the unit.

Tulchin and Kaplan next came to a further understanding in principle that the occupant of the position would have a reduced teaching schedule and additional pay, without getting into the specifics. When each voiced the view that the new head had to be acceptable to his principal, the Union and the administration, respectively, agreed that they would find a person acceptable to both of them. They then reviewed candidates from among LA&S faculty members, and, after Tulchin had tentatively agreed on three names and felt out one but was advised by the Union's executive board that in doing so he had exceeded his authority, he later reported that either of two candidates would be acceptable to the Union, and the provost chose Professor Bowman from that list.

Finally, Tulchin and Kaplan discussed the mechanism for Professor Bowman's achieving appointment to the position. As Kaplan had insisted on the incumbent being appointed to the position, Tulchin suggested that the humanities group nominate candidates. The provost guranteed that if Professor Bowman's name was on the list of nominees, he would be the individual selected. They next discussed the appropriateness of the idea of the restructuring being given to the Senate. Tulchin said he would line up the union votes in the Senate. Kaplan said, "I have a few chips outstanding there, and I can call them on this issue of the restructuring." The two then reiterated their agreement and shook hands on the deal.

These discussions took place prior to the Senate meeting of January 19, 1979. Before that meeting, Tulchin had met with other Senate members of a subcommittee appointed by the Senate to recommend the restructuring of the faculty of LA&S. Tulchin and one other member of the subcommittee were union executive board members. The subcommittee also included two other faculty members, one of whom was not a member of the Union, and two students. The Senate contained at least one other union executive board member.

At the meeting, Tulchin sat with Provost Kaplan (who attended along with Deans Tan and Sadek) at one side of a large square table. To Tulchin and Kaplan's surprise, in addition to the subcommittee's proposal, appendix A, the Senate was presented with another recommendation, appendix B, emanating from the LA&S faculty. One major difference between the two was that the faculty's proposal provided that the head of a reconstituted humanities group be a dean, a title expressly excluded from the certified bargaining unit, while the subcommittee's proposal listed the head as an elected coordinator. Tulchin testified that the provost expressed himself in strong language critical of the faculty members who had reneged on a promise to him to go along with the understanding. With certain changes, among them regarding nomenclature—Tulchin getting the provost's approval in a side bar conversation for giving the new humanities grouping the title of department and then speaking up in favor of such language—a third recommendation, appendix C, retaining most of the concepts of appendix A, was adopted.

It provided that the physics, chemistry, and mathematics faculty would become members of the faculty of the School of Engineering; humanities, social sciences, and art history faculty would constitute the faculty of humanities—with the understanding it would be a department with its own department head, elected for a 3-year term; members of the department would be assigned to the three schools in a manner, if possible, reflecting their preferences, with full voting rights in the school assigned and functioning under the governance; members of the three schools would participate in the department's curriculum committee; department members' recommendations would be sought on appointment, reappointment, promotion, and tenure as required by the Cooper Union-CUFCT agreement; the chairperson (or department head) would meet regularly with the three deans, be ex-officio member of the three schools and their administrative committees, and preside over departmental meetings, handle teaching assignments and scheduling, handle student matters, and recommend a draft departmental budget and monitor the budget approved; governance changes would reflect the foregoing and the humanities faculty would draft its internal rules or bylaws compatible with the collective-bargaining agreement.

About a week after the Senate meeting, Tulchin and Kaplan met again to discuss the terms and conditions under which Professor Bowman would hold the position. They agreed that the additional salary for the department head of humanities would be $5000 and that the reduction in workload would be slightly less than half the normal teaching load.

By memorandum dated February 21, 1979, President White addressed the Cooper Union faculties about the reorganization of the Liberal Arts and Science faculty. The reorganization follows in every respect the deal made between Tulchin and Kaplan as adopted by the Senate. The chemistry, mathematics, and physics academic staff will become members of the faculty of the School of Engineering, and the humanities and social sciences academic staff will become members of the three degree-granting faculties. Given the present level of staffing, four will become members of the Engineering faculty and two each will join the Architecture and Art faculties. These assignments will reflect balanced representation of the two disciplines and individual preferences. They will carry the full privileges of those faculties.

The humanities and social science group, for their own administrative and curriculum planning purposes, will be designated as the humanities department. A member is to be nominated by them to the president for appointment to a 3-year term as chairperson. The chairperson's responsibilities follow those specified in the Senate resolution. On curriculum matters, departmental faculty will serve on the other schools' committee, and representatives from those schools will participate in its curriculum considerations.

Certain governance changes were recommended relating to enlargement and cross-representation on school curriculum committees and the chairperson's inclusion on administrative committees. The president ended by expressing his gratitude to the student-faculty Senate for the diligent, evenhanded, and openminded assistance they provided in structuring this reorganization.

Provost Kaplan, as departing dean, next called a meeting of the humanities faculty pursuant to the president's request to receive nominations for the position of chairperson and preferences on assignments. Professor Richard S. Bowman was the only candidate nominated and received the faculty's unanimous vote for the position. Shortly afterward, President White appointed Bowman as chairman of the department.

Humanities Professor Gatza, CUFCT treasurer and member of its executive board, corroborated, in broad outline, Tulchin's testimony, in particular, as to his representing, reporting to, and receiving input from the Union's executive board on his negotiations with the provost regarding restructuring of the humanities grouping with a head recommended by them and to be included in the bargaining unit. Associate Professor of Architecture Wurmfeld, union executive board member and member of the Senate, also confirmed that the Senate in January 1979 implemented and formalized an administration-CUFCT agreement on humanities restructuring. As testified by Wurmfeld, through the fall of 1978 the Union's executive board had debated the best resolution of humanities structural requirements and kept abreast from Tulchin's reports of his meetings with Kaplan and ultimate commitment, including its submission to the Senate where the Union's board members on the Senate would vote as a group. The Union's executive board also later came to a consensus to support Professor Bowman as chairman and authorized Tulchin to propose Bowman in his meetings with the provost.

Provost Kaplan denied that Tulchin ever advised him that he was negotiating with him during the course of their frequent meetings held with respect to the 1979 humanities restructuring and the selection of a chairperson for the new department. Yet, Kaplan's testimony otherwise appears to corroborate various facets of Tulchin's narrative regarding the nature of their discussions. Thus, Kaplan recalled seeing Tulchin fairly often during that period. He also confirmed Tulchin's claim of influence in the Senate's consideration of selection of a chairperson and their narrowing consideration between the two of them to Professor Bowman and one other professor. At one point, Kaplan testified that without explicitly setting it forth, "I think he [Tulchin] understood that I understood that there were a number of members of the executive board of the Union on the Senate, and he was on the Senate too, so that he had some influence with those people." It is also clear that Kaplan did not specifically deny holding discussions with Tulchin at or before the January 1979 Senate meeting with reference to the form the restructuring should take. Neither did Kaplan explain why it was Tulchin, in particular, with whom he was meeting alone on a frequent basis or why the subjects of their discussions related to the choice of a humanities department head and the restructuring of the humanities grouping. I am compelled to conclude on the record before me that Tulchin's testimony is basically accurate and that Kaplan was well aware that Tulchin was representing the CUFCT and he was representing the administration in their off-the-record discussions, that they included reaching agreement on the form of the restructuring of the faculty of LA&S, including unit inclusion of its new head, and the manner in which the faculty input into these decisions would be expressed and approved.

F. Adoption of the 1978 Governances

In 1975, at President White's direction, his assistant and secretary to the board of trustees, Callcote Kindler, compiled a single document bringing up to date the 1964 governances by inserting on typed pages all amendments made between 1964 and 1975 to the governances. She did this by reviewing the minutes of the faculty meetings containing amendments they adopted and trustees' minutes approving the various amendments. She also crossed out those words and sections in the original which had been changed or modified, and referred to the appropriate amendment appearing on the following page. These handwritten crossings out and some notations were made by Kindler, and others were made by the president and represented his interpretation of application of the governances to the new structural change in 1975 when the three schools and faculty of LA&S were created. The president consulted with the provost on these interpretations.

The governance documents with the insertions, amendments, and interpretations remained solely in the possession of the administration for its use, and were not made available to the faculty, although, as earlier indicated, from time to time President White requested the faculties to address major revisions of the governances in light of the restructurings, particularly those in 1975.

According to Union President Tulchin, corroborated by Provost Kaplan, after the 1978 collective-bargaining agreement was executed in March of that year, the two of them got together pursuant to its terms to make changes in the governances to bring them into conformity with article XXIII of the agreement and to make minor changes to bring them into conformity with the existing structural organization of the institution. Article XXIII provided: "The application of the Governances shall not affect subject matters covered under this Agreement. In other matters (i.e., matters which do not fall within the definition of 'Terms and Conditions of Employment'), the Governances of each faculty (i.e., Art, Architecture, Engineering) as they currently exist or, in the case of the Arts and Sciences Faculty, as established in the future, shall remain in full force and effect pursuant to the terms of each Governance, respectively." In meeting with the provost, Tulchin was acting under authorization by the Union's executive board to conduct negotiations, including those relating to the governances.

For the first time, a member of the faculty, Tulchin, saw a compilation of all of the governances, as amended since 1964, in one document. Together, he and Kaplan reviewed the amended and revised compilation for the purpose of seeking agreement on those portions which affected terms and conditions of employment dealt with in the union contract, removing them from the governances, and to arrive at an agreed-upon version of the governances. Both Tulchin and Kaplan made markings on the document as they went along, reflecting their agreements on deletions and modifications in language of the governances.

According to Tulchin, he and the provost worked from the original compilation of 1964 governances with changes and typed revisions contained in a loseleaf bound folder and bearing the title "Faculty Governance and Interpretation June 1975." Provost Kaplan believed the working document he and Tulchin reviewed was a Xerox copy of the looseleaf bound volume. I conclude that Tulchin rather than Provost Kaplan is correct here, and that, indeed, the two of them were working from and worked up the original compilation of materials.

During their discussions, at least one difference arose between them, regarding the continued inclusion of the administrative committee in the governances. The Union wanted the committe abolished and the Provost countered that if the administrative committee was removed then the curriculum committee should also be out. Tulchin objected to this latter proposal. As a result of their continued negotiations over the matter, a compromise was reached whereby the administrative committee was retained in all school governances but certain preexisting language providing that "the activities of the members of the committee shall reflect the interests of the Faculty [and] . . . shall seek to interpret these interests to the President through the Dean or through representative on the Senate" was deleted.

The end result was that Tulchin and Kaplan reached agreement on all changes and modifications, a clear copy of the revised governances was prepared, it was checked over, and a covering letter to accompany issuance of the new governances was prepared, dated September 12, 1978, signed by Tulchin, as president of the CUFCT, and White, as president of the institution, and was attached to the front page of the new governances. The letter noted, inter alia, that the governances were in conformance with article XXIII of the agreement, and that changes were made to bring them into conformity with article XXIII and with the existing structural organization of the Cooper Union.

Among other changes which appear in the 1978 school governances are the following: In article I three members of the adjunct teaching staff, elected by all part-time teachers for terms of 1, 2, or 3 years, are included as members of the faculty; ex-officio members, including the president, all deans other than of the school itself, and adjuncts, are specifically denied the vote; officers of the particular faculty now include a parliamentarian; students shall be represented at faculty meetings by three student members of standing committees elected by such students and they shall have a vote each; one alumnus as representative from the Alumni Association shall attend faculty meetings, without vote; deleted are paragraphs describing the faculty members' advisory responsibility in recommending appointments and promotions of department members (covered in the collective agreement) and department heads (eliminated in the early 1970s); deleted in article V are references to the committees on calendar and schedules (covered in part in an academic calendar, article IV, of the collective-bargaining agreement) and Academic Freedom and Tenure (covered in an "Academic Freedom and Responsibility," provision, article II, which tracks to a considerable extent the substance of the academic freedom described in appendix III to the 1964 faculty policy manual and in other articles dealing with dismissal of tenured faculty, article XIX, discipline, article XX, and grievance and arbitration procedures, article XXII, which permit grievances and, if unresolved after two preliminary steps, arbitration of all unresolved disputes concerning the application, the interpretation, or the reasonableness thereof or other claimed violation of any term or condition of the agreement, not excluding disputes concerning dismissal or discipline for conduct claimed protected under article II); committees now include as ex-officio members alumni representatives and student representatives; the Senate includes two faculty members elected by each school's faculty, including the faculty of LA&S (still in existence at this time in 1978), two elected student undergraduates from each school, the ex-officio members, the president and school deans shall be nonvoting members, and the term of faculty members is to be 3 years except at the first election one member from each faculty to be elected for 2 years and the term for student members shall be 1 year; each committee, in addition to including the school's dean, the dean of admissions and records, and alumnus, as ex-officio novoting members, also includes two full-time faculty, one part-time faculty, and one student, except that the dean chairs the administrative committee and votes and on all committees except administrative, and the chairperson shall be a full-time faculty member.

G. Current Complement of all Employees and Students by School

In July 1980, at the time of Cooper Union's withdrawal of recognition from the CUFCT, the School of Engineering had a complement of between 30 and 35 full-time faculty, including a handful of humanities faculty assigned to the school, the School of Architecture had approximately 9 full-time faculty, including 2 humanities members assigned, and the School of Art had approximately 8 full-time members of the Art faculty, including 2 humanities faculty assigned. In the 1981–1982 academic year, the student body, institutionwide, comprised approximately 1000 undergraduate students, including 175 in the School of Architecture, 420 in the School of Art, and the balance, 405, in the School of Engineering.

In addition to full-time faculty, there were adjunct faculty hired in each school from time to time to teach individual courses and relieve full-time faculty on leave of absence or sabbatical leave for a semester or academic year. At any one time, adjuncts probably equaled or exceeded the number of full-time faculty. Professor Wurmfeld estimated that in the School of Architecture alone, anywhere between 20 and 50 adjunct faculty had been hired in the 10 years since he became a full-time member of the Architecture faculty in 1972.

Besides full-time and adjunct faculty, the institution also employed shop and laboratory assistants or technicians, four to five shop assistants and a shop supervisor in the School of Art alone, a small complement of professional and clerical library employees, administrative assistants and clerical support employees for the deans and other administrators, and a maintenance staff.

H. Administration of the Library System After 1976

1. Cooper Union's entry into the library consortium

Until 1977, Cooper Union maintained its own indepenent library services. A working collection for Art, Architecture, and Engineering was (and is presently) located on the first floor of the Foundation Building. Library services were under the direction of a head librarian, who was assisted by a number of assistant librarians, a few clerks, and a complement of student part-time workers.

By memorandum dated March 14, 1977, President White, in an attempt to dispel rumors of the elimination of library services at Cooper Union, disclosed to the Cooper Union community for the first time that there had been discussions among Cooper Union, New York University, and The New School for Social Research (including Parsons Institute of Design) in order to explore the possibility of entering into some sort of cooperative library arrangement.

In a letter to President White dated April 20, 1977, responding to his invitation made at a meeting with students and faculty on March 24 to express their views on the matter, the faculty of the School of Art transmitted a resolution adopted unanimously at its regular, semiannual meeting held on April 19, including, inter alia, the conclusion that in order to preserve the viability of their educational programs, the jurisdiction over the Cooper Union library should remain exclusively with Cooper Union and no part thereof is to be delegated outside this school.

At the meeting with faculty, President White gave a capsule history of the discussions underway among the three institutions to enter a cooperative venture and to computerize their collections, including the solicitation of grant money to finance the venture. He assured the faculty that they would have adequate opportunity to give advice before the arrangement was completed, but that the final decision would be made by himself and the board of trustees. It was in this context that the Art faculty adopted their resolution.

In response to that resolution, White assured the faculty by letter of April 25 that under any plan Cooper Union would retain full jurisdiction over it own library, and the other concerns expressed in the resolution would be satisfied. But White now advised, "As soon as an agreed upon proposal is reached . . . the faculty and students will be informed and your suggestions . . . given serious consideration." (Emphasis added.)

In a formal 7-page document transmitted to the Cooper Union community under date of May 5, 1977, White set forth the basic plan for possible cooperative delivery of library services among the three institutions, and welcomed all suggestions and recommendations which would be seriously considered by the administration and trustees. A deadline of June 1 was set for receipt of all comments. At the heart of the agreement was NYU's undertaking the purchase and cataloging of all new materials, installing an automated, on-live circulation system, and including the Cooper Union and New School libraries in its own computer output microfilm catalog program. These services were to be provided for a fee to be paid by Cooper Union and New School. All libraries of the three schools except certain NYU professional school libraries were to open to normal access by all students and faculties at the three institutions. The agreement delegated administrative responsibility and authority for all library operations at Cooper Union and New School to the dean of libraries at NYU, on behalf of and subject to the approval of each school president—thus, the Art faculty's concern over loss of jurisdiction by Cooper Union over its library. The agreement was to terminate after 3 years on August 31, 1980. It was later extended in 1979 to August 31, 1983.

At a special meeting on May 17, 1977, the faculty of the School of Architecture unanimously adopted a resolution critical of the minor consideration given to the educational aspects in the president's report. In its letter to the president informing him of the resolution, the faculty also advised of a resolution unanimously adopted on April 28, requesting the formation of an elected library committee. The faculty now requested that the president's report of the agreement not be implemented until the formation of this committee and its study of the proposal. At this time, and since 1976, an ad hoc library committee had been serving, appointed by the president. It was not until 1980 that the administration approved a Senate plan for a new faculty-student selected library committee.

In a letter to the trustees dated May 24, 1977, Professors Richard Bowman, the chairman of the library committee, and Thaddeus Gatza of the humanities faculty urged that no decision be made on the cooperative library services proposal until all the faculties had adequate time to study it and respond with suggestions and recommendations. The letter agreed that the June 1 deadline for comments was impossibly abrupt and precipitous, given the limited time in May for last classes, final exams, senior grades, and end of month holiday. The letter further claimed that the administration had achieved the May 9 proposal while rejecting the involvement of its own professional librarians, faculty library committee, and faculty and student body in general. It (the administration) had done so with the argument that there was nothing to discuss until a foundation responded with an award to the application for a grant. The letter went on to raise a number of questions, among them ones regarding the ultimate disposition of the 48,715 volumes in the humanities, social sciences, general science, and mathematics categories, and whether an adequate working collection would be retained on site. Two other members of the four-member library advisory committee, as well as other influential faculty members, joined the protest by separate memos and letters in the period of late May to June 1.

Union President Tulchin also requested an opportunity of Provost Kaplan to discuss the library venture as having a significant impact on terms and conditions of employment and on March 11 urgently requested a meeting to discuss the matter. There is no evidence that the Union had any separate opporunity to contribute comments other than that provided to the faculty generally as described.

2. Continuing faculty-administration conflict over the consortium

In spite of this overwhelming faculty sentiment opposing entry into the consortium without adequate faculty deliberation and consideration, the agreement, without change, was executed by President White on June 16, and by the other two presidents on June 16 and 17, 1977, and shortly thereafter at its July meeting was approved by the Cooper Union board of trustees.

Faculty opposition to the consortium continued unabated. There were faculty expressions of concern and disapproval when the head librarian informed the members of the library committee in May 1978 of the standing orders of books dropped and the over 100 periodical subscriptions not renewed for 1978. In November 1979, the faculty members of the president's library advisory committee presented to the administration a draft recommendation for changes in and discontinuance of certain procedures under the library agreement. These included the return to Cooper Union of the placement and processing of all purchase orders for new materials, the reviewing and cataloging of new materials by Cooper Union library personnel, no transfer of any materials to the NYU Bobst library, the return of the administration and authority over Cooper Union's library to Cooper Union, and the renegotiation of the annual payments of more than $40,000 to NYU as Cooper Union's share in the library consortium.

The draft recommendations had earlier been presented to the NYU library dean. In an August 1979 memorandum that dean castigated the committee for proposing "the reversion to a completely localized library operation at Cooper Union while retaining full access and privileges at NYU Bobst Library for Cooper Union's faculty and students" and he suggested such an approach was contrary to the basic purpose and objective of the consortium. He hoped that dialogue with the committee would turn to matters of substance in implementing the objectives of the agreement.

Both the faculties of the Schools of Art and Engineering advised the NYU library dean that they had unanimously adopted resolutions at their fall 1979 meetings supporting in general the draft recommendations of May 1979 of the library advisory committee. As noted earlier, in 1979 the agreement was extended without change in substance, for an additional 3-year period, to August 31, 1983.

Earlier, in June 1978, President White informed the library committee that the position of head librarian had been eliminated, effective July 1. The notice also advised that the administration was advertising for a librarian specializing in engineering and science to replace a retiring assistant, and, further, that a librarian would be selected shortly to perform onsite administrative and coordinating duties under the NYU dean's supervision. A week prior to this written announcement to the committee, its then faculty chairman, Professor Ralph Knapp, had been summoned to the president's office and told of the decision to eliminate the head librarian position and retire the incumbent. Knapp asked if financial provisions had been made for the head's last year and White said he would receive his full salary for that year. Professon Knapp testified to his discomfort and difficulty it caused him with the committee arising from what he perceived as a mischaracterization as to his participation in these matters when, at the foot of his memo to the committee, the president stated, "Your chairman was consulted on this matter in advance." Knapp testified he believed the president took advantage of him in that statement when he had only been informed of decisions already made.

At the hearing the parties entered into a stipulation: (1) that Cooper Union decided to institute a new position of coordinator of library services and established the job duties of the position; (2) the institution negotiated with the Union the salary for that position, with the understanding that a portion of that salary would be that which the person had earned in her position as librarian, and in addition an added sum for performing administrative duties of the position; (3) the institution furnished to the Union at its request a description setting forth the duties of the new position; (4) Union President Tulchin sought to have a search made for a coordinator to avoid the possibility of a sex discrimination charge in discussions with the provost; (5) a search was made, and a Mrs. Vajda, an assistant librarian, was selected for the new position.

In January 1980, the new president, Bill Lacy, approved in writing to the chairman of the student-faculty Senate the Senate's motion to establish an ad hoc library committee, and to include the appointment of the present faculty members of the president's library advisory committee. Lacy noted that while these members were appointed by the president, they were elected by their respective faculty constituencies. He approved the change immediately. The Senate committee which had been approved at its October 30, 1979 meeting had heard Professor Hans Haacke, the then library advisory committee chairperson, severely criticize the administration for its failure to fulfill the mandate of the committee to advise on the establishment of policies and procedures to provide a more excellent, efficient, and economic library service by its and the NYU dean's withholding relevant information from it and by excluding it from specified important policy discussions, in particular the 3-year extension of the consortium agreement while the committee was drafting recommendations for what it assumed to be the eventual negotiation of the agreement. The decision to establish the ad hoc committee was viewed during the debate as enhancing the faculties' role and potential influence on the library consortium policies. The record contains no evidence that faculty influence increased or was felt after the establishment of the ad hoc committee.

3. The work of the library staff and their relations to faculty and students in work study programs

The certified unit includes librarians and assistant librarians.

Assistant librarian Irene Perry testified that she was hired by Vajda in July 1980. Her specialty is in engineering. There are two other assistant librarians, each having a different subject specialty. The staff also includes 3 full-time clerks, 2 part-time clerks, and 15 student part-time workers.

Perry spends 3 hours a day providing reference assistance and research assistance in engineering and general reference areas. The other 4 hours of her workday are divided among her other responsibilities. These include collection development in engineering, stock maintenance, maintenance of the card catalog, processing of new acquisitions, serials (periodicals), and documents, handling of student workers, and advising and assisting the library coordinator in the preparation of reports and project planning in her capacity as liaison with NYU library and technical liaison with its engineering school.

The three full-time clerks have a number of different duties: one works at the circulation desk, charging and receiving books and entering data into the circulation computer; another is secretary for the library, physically processing books and the periodical collection, and performing other miscellaneous clerical duties; and the third acts as assistant to the coordinator, placing book orders, handling petty cash, and doing some accounting.

One of the two part-time clerks assists in the slide library, typing headings and mounting slides, and the other is the evening circulation attendant. The library opens at 8:45 a.m., Monday through Friday, and closes at 10 p.m. on Monday, 8 p.m. on Tuesday and Thursday, and 6 p.m. on Wednesday and Friday.

All of the clerks report to Vajda. The coordinator hires them, gives them time off from work, keeps their time records, schedules their work hours and days, and disciplines them when deemed necessary. Perry does not prepare any work evaluation of the clerks, and has never recommended a clerk's promotion or removal. Once a week, on Monday evenings from 5 to 10 p.m., Perry is in charge of the library in the absence of Vajda. During Vadja's summer and other vacation time, the three assistant librarians rotate as librarian in charge.

At the direction of Vajda, Perry, along with the other assistants, has helped train the part-time clerks. It appears that the jobs of both the full- and part-time clerks are quite routine in nature. A very small percentage of Perry's time—less than 10 percent—is spent instructing clerks in particular work tasks. On one occasion, in the spring of 1981, her recommendation to terminate a full-time clerk for an unreported absence of several days was not followed. Instead, the individual was warned and docked pay for the absence. Perry, as most senior assistant librarian, neither hired nor recommended hire of the other two assistant librarians. In the case of one of them, with whose hiring she was familiar, no faculty participated in interviewing or recommending hire. Perry does not sit on any governance committee of the institution, Dean Tan having denied a request made by the library coordinator, Vajda, that she sit on the School of Engineering curriculum committee.

The parties stipulated that the three assistant librarians receive substantially equivalent salaries and the library coordinator earns a substantially higher salary.

Of the approximately 15 part-time students, half at the time of the hearing were in a work study program, with 80 percent of their salaries paid by the institution's financial aid office and 20 percent paid out of the library budget. Their work applications are screened by the aid office which applies a need criterion to them.

Approximately 25 students apply for these positions each semester. Perry interviewed each of the candidates for the fall 1981 semester, questioned them about their work background and the hours they were available for work, and then recommended for hire to Vajda the 15 students who were ultimately employed.

There is relatively high turnover among the students, 5 of the 10 initially hired in the fall of 1981 having been replaced before or at the completion of their work term. Perry's recommendation not to continue two students in the second semester of the 1981–1982 school year was followed by the coordinator. While employed they check identification of library users and see that books are not removed without authorization. They also act as pages placing books back in their proper places on the library shelves. The students are not assigned to work for a particular assistant librarian.

Perry trains the students, providing them with a manual describing the two different functions and regularly checking to see they are doing their job correctly. Vajda also participates in the day-to-day training of the students. Perry and Vajda together review work performance to determine whether students who wish to return are retained for the second semester in a school year. Perry also maintains time and attendance records on the students except for the student assistant in the slide library, who reports to another assistant librarian in art, and, when students are late or absent from work without excuse three times, has, with the concurrence of Vajda, terminated them in accordance with the disciplinary regulation set forth in a written instruction sheet provided the students on their commencement of employment. Perry updated and thoroughly rewrote the instruction sheet which, with the approval of Vajda, was thereafter posted. The updating clarified the penalty for unexcused lateness or absence from work.

Perry spends approximately 5 percent of her time evaluating, interviewing, monitoring, and working with the student assistants. The students are paid an hourly stipend of either $3.50 or $3.65. Further, unlike the librarians, who receive an annual salary paid monthly, at a substantially higher rate of pay, they receive no fringe benefits and only 2 of the 15 student workers continue working during the summer recess. The assistant librarians receive a paid vacation, sick leave, and medical insurance, among other fringe benefits.

None of the librarians employed by Cooper Union are members of the faculty nor do they participate in governance committees. Neither the librarians nor the faculty supervise or evaluate the work of the other nor does either have anything to do with determining the vacation schedule, salaries, fringe benefits, overtime hours, or any other terms or conditions of employment of the other. They, of course, do come into professional contact and work relationship from time to time in terms of faculty recommendations on additions to the collections in their subject fields and in faculty arrangements to use or borrow texts or books in the collections.

I. Faculty Participation in Academic Matters

1. Administrative matters

a. Appointment of presidents, deans, and other administrators

In 1968, the minutes of a joint faculty meeting held that September report that the then chairman of the board of trustees addressed the members present, informing them that following the sudden death of President Humphreys, Dean Teller had been appointed administrative head of Cooper Union and had agreed to serve up to 90 days in that capacity while the trustees continued their search for a new president. Dean Teller then made further remarks, including an announcement of the formation of an advisory committee to the board of trustees for the selection of a president, composed of division heads, heads of departments, and three faculty members, one elected from each academic division. President White was ultimately selected as the new president by the trustees sometime thereafter. It is clear that the division heads referred to administrators of the divisions (schools) of the institution, holding broad managerial responsibilities.

When President White submitted his resignation in 1979, the trustees retained an executive search firm to assist in the preliminary screening process. The Senate minutes of March 13, 1979, include reference and discussion of a report by Provost Kaplan of the institution's executive search. The "weeding out" process being conducted by the search firm was then underway, 80 applications having been received in response to an ad appearing in the New York Times. Kaplan indicated in response to an inquiry that the Senate would have input in the selection process. The input of the faculty-student Senate ultimately took the form of conducting interviews of the two final candidates and endorsing the selection of the candidate who was chosen as the president to succeed White, Bill Lacy. The July 16, 1979 letter to the chairman of the board of trustees endorsing Lacy's selection shows that due to the fact that the meeting with the two candidates took place during the summer, 12 faculty members, not all of whom were duly elected Senators, participated.

The 1978 governance provides that when faced with the task of filling the office of president, a committee shall be formed consisting of the heads of educational divisons and the vice president of business affairs. This committee shall submit a list of qualified candidates to the trustees for their consideration. Thus, faculty were excluded from the process, except for the limited role the Senate was permitted to play, and except for some reference in the minutes of the engineering administrative committee meeting of February 12, 1979, to the Dean's solicitation of Engineering faculty input in the selection process and a reference to the fact that names of candidates could be directly submitted to the trustees, dean, and the administrative committee.

According to Professor Hans Haacke, whose testimony in this regard went largely unrebutted, there were a number of instances when the faculty was not consulted concerning the appointment of administrators. The position of provost was created and filled in 1970 or 1971 without input of the faculty. The position of dean of the School of Architecture was created and filled in 1975 without faculty input. The position of associate dean for health, recreation, and safety was created and filled in the late 1970s without faculty consultation. The position of dean of admissions and registrar was created and filled in the early 1970s without faculty input. When Dean Sadek left his position as dean of the School of Art during the 1980–1981 academic year the faculty was not consulted. Testimony supported the conclusion that Sadek resigned under fire after a private consultation with the president following his meeting with a delegation of students demanding Sadek's resignation. Sadek subsequently returned to full time teaching and, effective in the fall of 1981, was appointed director of the design center of Cooper Union, a unit of the institution established in approximately 1979 to perform typesetting and typographic work for in-house publications as well as for nonprofit outside clients. The faculty had no role in establishing the design center, the creation of which had been initiated by Sadek when he was still Art School dean. Neither was the faculty consulted on Sadek's appointment following his resignation as dean.

Following Dean Sadek's resignation, in accordance with the 1978 governance, Professor Corwin, as senior member of the Art School faculty, became acting dean. As senior member Corwin also served as chairperson of the three-member governance committee which made a search for a new dean and presented one candidate, Lee Ann Miller, who was in fact appointed dean of the Art School.

In 1972, at a time when the School of Engineering had been restructured as a division, the faculty participated in a division meeting held on October 25, which, inter alia, voted to recommend to the administration a successor head of the division to succeed then Dean Vopat. The minutes disclose that the faculty first voted unanimously to define the word "majority" in the rules previously adopted for the election of a slate for division head to mean a majority of the faculty members of the division. Next, as a result of a split first ballot, the two candidates receiving the least votes were eliminated. A second ballot yielded seven votes for Tan, nine for Wallace, and lesser votes, five and six, for the two other remaining candidates. The members then unanimously approved Tan and Wallace as the slate for head of the division. Although receiving two fewer votes, Tan was selected by the administration as division head.

The manner of faculty participation in the selection of Professor Bowman as departmental chairman of humanities, on the 1979 restructuring has been reviewed supra. During the 1980–1981 academic year, President Lacy asked Bowman to step down as chairman and Bowman readily acceded to the request, resigning his position as head of the department effective with the end of the year. Bowman's successor was chosen under the following circumstances. As explained by Professor Gatza, the full-time members of the department constituted a search committee, there was a chairman of that committee, and applications for the position were solicited by advertisement. The committee reviewed the applications and, based on professional judgments as to their qualifications, interviewed some of the applicants. Subsequently, at a meeting held with President Lacy, the committee members rejected all applicants. Finally, during the summer of 1981, the search committee agreed to the professional qualifications of a Professor Michael Sundell, not then a member of the faculty. Each member of the committee wrote President Lacy, with a consensus in favor of Sundell, and Sundell was appointed.

b. The administrative committees

The charge of this committee has been described supra and did not change in substance in 1978. Prior to 1978, the committe in each school (or division) consisted of the dean, as chairperson, and the heads of department. Following the issuance of the 1978 governances, the School of Engineering committee now comprised the dean, as chairperson, and, as revised unilaterally by the Dean on an interim basis, one elected member from each Engineering discipline. The School of Art and Architecture committees were changed to include, in addition to the dean chairperson, two full-time faculty, one part-time faculty, one student, and one graduate, with only the representative for the Alumni Association not having a vote.

At the April 12, 1977 meeting of the Architecture School committee, it received nominations for adjunct faculty representatives to the curriculum and academic standards committees to be voted on at the April faculty meeting. Dean Hejduk also presented the March minutes of the curriculum committee in which various curriculum changes were approved by the sole vote of the full-time faculty members in attendance, the chairman only voting in case of a tie. The Dean then moved that the actions of the curriculum committee be endorsed and presented to the School of Architecture faculty. The motion passed. Also discussed were requests that the committee support the school's funding of materials for student construction of drafting area enclosures and that a committee be established to determine future Cooper Union exhibitions and publications.

Thereafter, no meeting was held of the Architecture School administrative committee until April 9, 1981, 4 years having elapsed without a meeting. As explained by Professor Wurmfeld, the chairman of the Architecture School curriculum committee during the same 4-year period and a member of the administrative committee from 1978 to 1981, it was the dean's prerogative to call the meeting. It was also the dean who prepared and controlled the agenda of items to be considered at the meeting. The dean failed to call any meeting. On one occasion, in 1979, Wurmfeld, as chairman of the curriculum committee, had forwarded to the dean and administrative committee members minutes of a curriculum meeting at which curriculum changes had been approved. No administrative committee meeting was held; instead, the dean took these changes directly to the faculty with his recommendation for approval; they were approved by the faculty and then implemented by the administration. Among the changes approved were ones dropping social science and philosophy from the first year and adding them to the third year; expanding the credits for the introductory first year architecture courses from 4 to 5 each semester; reducing general studies electives from 6 to 3 credits each semester in the third year; reducing the fifth year thesis course credits from 10 to 9 each semester and adding for the fifth year a requirement for a 2 credit advanced course each semester dealing with the relationship between architectural space and some other discipline in the humanities; and a restructuring of the elective history of architecture program by announcing an attempt to coordinate these courses into a sequence of offerings on a biannual cyclical basis.

Finally, an April 9, 1981 meeting was called not by the dean but by Professor Richard Henderson, a faculty member who assumed administrative duties while Dean Hejduk was on sabbatical leave at the dean's request. The agenda for that meeting was to create a slate of nominees to fill vacancies for the following semester on the various standing committees for positions which had opened because of the expiration of the 3-year terms of the incumbents.

Minutes of School of Art and Architecture administrative committee meetings in 1974 and 1975, before the 4-year hiatus in meeting of the Architecture School committee, show that they dealt with such matters as receipt of nominations from the Alumni Association for alumni membership on the standing committees, conditions and terms for exhibition of student work in the institution's gallery, discussion of and agreement to seek to expand library hours in discussions with the provost, and the approval of renewed 3-year teaching contracts for part-time faculty.

There was some question whether the administrative committee of the School of Art and Architecture prior to its separation into separate schools in the 1975 reorganization dealt with budgetary matters. Professor Wurmfeld testified credibly that when he became a member of the administrative committee in 1978, Professor Robert Slutzky of the committee informed him that he had never seen a budget document setting forth categories of projected income and expenditures in his years on the committee. In his role as a member of the committee, Wurmfeld never reviewed or was consulted on any budget for the School of Art and Architecture breaking down operating expenses by salaries and other costs and expenses subdivided for each of the two operating entities or showing separately any overall shared costs for the two schools. Thus, he could not explain a statement in the minutes of the administrative committee for February 28, 1974, under the heading "Budget Report" in which the chairman, Dean George Sadek, reported "he has had budget hearings." There is no record evidence showing any budget hearings involving faculty. The hearing to which the dean referred probably was one involving administrators only at which the deans presented and discussed proposed budgets with the provost and president.

Representative minutes of administrative committee meetings for the School of Art following its establishment as a separate school for academic year 1975–1976 show that it reviewed the budgetary request of the School of Art and recommended funds be requested for equipment purchase, maintenance, and repair; reviewed upcoming adjunct faculty contracts and recommended reappointments to a 3-year adjunct contract, at the same time cautioning the dean to consider contract renewals separately from promotion in rank recommendations; recommended nonrenewal of certain adjunct teacher contracts; based on teacher evaluations, discontinued courses, low enrollment among other reaons; obtained the dean's agreement to a procedure for followup evaluation of first year students, including teacher access to entrance portfolios and mandatory teacher meetings to compare notes and discuss individual students before grading; approved and forwarded to the faculty curriculum committee curriculum changes, including a final version of the foundation program of study as well as a list of prerequisite courses in painting and graphic design; unanimously approved a new first year curriculum, as well as an additional requirement and suggestions for presentation to the faculty for its approval, including a direction that the chairman of the curriculum committee initiate hearings within the specific major areas of study in order to present a system of prerequisite courses to the administrative committee and, in turn, to the faculty; approved adjunct teacher promotions; agreed on a plan to improve job counseling for senior students; discussed moving video program facilities to the School of Engineering because of available space and technical staff assistance; discussed increasing the length of certain visiting professorships; discussed possible solutions to varying class sizes and excessive waiting lists of applicants at registration; and persuaded the dean not to combine separate techniques and workshop courses in the video program for at least 1 year.

The minutes of the administrative committee of the School of Engineering for the period 1974 to 1980 likewise show a broad range of concerns, as it debated and recommended under the dean's chairmanship solutions to a wide range of educational problems and sifted, evaluated, and passed on to the faculty for its determination the recommendations of the various standing committees. It took up policies on evaluating transcripts of transfer student applicants; discussed methods of determining teaching hour credits and what constitutes a normal workload; approved a policy prohibiting receipt by employees of remuneration, other than in the form of an honorarium by a recognized nonprofit professional or scholarly society, for use of Cooper Union facilities for work performed for another agency or institution; recommended to the administration limiting use of the school's facilities to current faculty, staff, and students; sought solutions to problems involving shop technicians to increase efficiency and make technical support more responsive to teacher needs; recommended that students satisfying both physics and math curricular requirements receive credit for two majors; endorsed notification of a student's faculty counselor on placement or continued retention on probation; arrived at a consensus on continuing a freshman counselor program after retirement of the incumbent; received reports of budget preparations by the dean and division heads; clarified the rule permitting students dropping required courses prior to midsemester; made nominations for membership on standing committees; made provision for student membership, by student election of a representative, not provided in the 1978 governance, to be excluded when the committee went into executive session (to deal with personnel matters involving individual faculty members) and agreed to hold special meetings for student matters; prior to the 1979 Liberal Arts and Science reorganization, in 1978, agreed to liberal arts and science representation on the engineering curriculum committee, one from liberal arts and one from science, but without a vote; discussed formation and staffing of ad hoc committees; persuaded the dean that faculty all meet a 12-member, predominantly alumini, advisory council formed by the administration to advise the school on matters pertaining to its educational programs, after its first meeting with the trustees and registrar; in 1979, strongly advised the dean to seek an associate dean, received and reviewed the dean's listing of an associate dean's responsibilities, and unanimously recommended the dean pursue the appointment to the post of adjunct electrical engineering faculty member Larry Hollander (who was ultimately appointed to the newly created position); in 1979 unanimously agreed that deciding on appointment of new faculty shall be the responsibility of the committee and then recommended and obtained the dean's approval to recruit two new full-time faculty members, at the assistant professor level, one in the area of electronics and computer engineering and the other in structural engineering; in 1979 recommended a new composition of the Senate for consideration by the joint faculty, and discussed at length over a number of meetings a new makeup of the committee in light of the reassignment to the Engineering School of a majority of the liberal arts and science faculty, and the Dean's proposal adding to the committee's convernance responsibilities advising and assisting the dean on administrative matters dealing with the everyday and longer term needs of students and faculty related to academic programs.

c. Establishment of the graphics design center

According to the unrebutted testimony of Professor of Art Hans Haacke, some time in the late 1970s George Sadek, then dean of the School of Art, and Rudolph de Harak, professor of graphic design, drew up a petition among the graphics area part-time teaching staff to establish a design center within the Art School. Professor de Harak was then the only full-time member in the graphics area. The petitioners bypassed both the faculty and Senate and presented it directly to the president. The faculty did not vote on the establishment of the center. The center was approved by the administration and continues in existence to date. It is known formally as the Center for Design and Typography under the direction of Professor Sadek following his resignation as dean, and performs the services described in section I,1,a, paragraph 4, supra.

With respect to the in-house publications, including catalogues, produced by the design center, none of the faculty either in the Art School or otherwise have any say about the allocation of institutional funds for this purpose.

d. Discontinuance of degree-granting programs

The manner in which the mathematics, physics, and distributed science degree-granting programs were eliminated by the administration in 1975 without apparent faculty participation in the decision making process and, indeed, over widespread faculty opposition once the changes were announced has been described above.

e. Institution of the SHAPE program

In 1975, Professor LeMee of the Engineering faculty applied to the Mellon Foundation for a grant to study and apply an integrative approach to professional education in engineering. The minutes of the meeting of the Engineering faculty of September 25, 1975, note this proposal submitted by a member of the faculty. At the next meeting, held October 14, 1975, the chairman, Dean Tan, reported that the Mellon Foundation had awarded a grant of $100,000 to the school for the study and that a study group would be formed shortly. Professor Ralph Knapp of the engineering faculty testified that he had not been invited to join any such committee or recomend its composition, and that the faculty did not participate in its selection. Membership on the committee was by appointment.

At the March 2, 1976 continuation of the regular meeting of the faculty, Professor LeMee gave a report on the Mellon study group. The project had been named SHAPE, an acronym for the "Synthesis of a Holistic Approach to Professional Education." Its main objective was to design a curriculum in Engineering for a small group of students based on an integrative approach to professional education. The theoretical base of the integrative approach was contained in several papers published by LeMee, copies of which were available from him. LeMee said the project team was meeting Monday afternoons, minutes of its meetings were available to peruse at the dean's office, and faculty members and students were invited to the project planning center to view the displays or to attend the Monday meetings as observers. The minutes of the meeting also note that a recently appointed visiting professor, Dr. Lee Harrisberger, whose appointment was funded by the Carnegie Corporation, after his introduction, spoke about his involvement with project SHAPE and urged the entire faculty to help the project team make it a success. Faculty did not vote to recommend candidates for visiting professorships.

At the faculty meeting of October 4, 1977, Dean Tan announced the appointment of Professor Huckaba as director of engineering program development. He would be seeking funds to implement programs developed by SHAPE. The prior year, Huckaba, like Harrisberger, had been an Andrew Carnegie visiting professor. By the 1977–1978 academic year, Huckaba had become a member of the regular full-time faculty.

According to Professor Knapp, for a considerable period of time after the formation of the SHAPE committee it was shrouded in mystery. By this he meant faculty generally were not encouraged to learn what it was doing. For a period of time the committee did not make a detailed report of its studies and faculty not involved with project were not kept informed through the governance mechanisms of how it was fulfilling its objective. It was Professor Knapp's judgment that when they did learn more about it a considerable number of the Engineering faculty, at least more than half, were opposed to the project as a program that would dilute the intellectual content of the curricula being offered by the school and would make the education of its students weaker than it was with the regular program at Cooper Union. In Professor Knapp's views, SHAPE dealt with teaching techniques as opposed to intellectual content—something a competent professor should fit into any course content without the necessity of having a special program to enforce it. Knapp testified that he did not become involved with the SHAPE program because he was never specifically asked to do so. He was waiting for that invitation because his own technique of teaching was very much related to what SHAPE was supposed to do. He had been teaching competencies for the 22 years he had been in the school and was not approached to be on the SHAPE committee, nor was he ever approached to teach in the SHAPE fashion.

At some point after its introduction as an experimental teaching program, the SHAPE program received a National Science Foundation grant and it continues to date under such renewed funding, now known as the D.I.S.E. Program.

The objections of certain engineering faculty to the continued operation of the program without broader faculty input took concrete form. Physics Professor Samuel Gelfman was called down by the dean in the summer of 1979 and told that the school had received a grant for experimental teaching programs. The dean said new methods of teaching were going to be employed which stressed the competencies of communication, problem solving, and value judgment. This was the first time that Gelfman became aware of the program. The dean said a set of courses had been selected for a 2-year experimental program under an NSF grant which originally included a chemistry course but after receipt of the grant he had been informed it was not practical to include chemistry so it was decided to replace that course with a physics course. The dean asked Gelfman if he was interested in teaching one section of the freshman physics course 12 in the SHAPE mode, Gelfman said he wanted to learn more about it, and the dean told him to see Professor LeMee. After talking with LeMee, Gelfman became convinced the experimental course was not a good medium for teaching physics 12, especially a freshman course, and told this to the dean. The dean responded that he would find someone else to teach it, he would not give up the grant. When the dean approached Physics Professor Yalow to teach the course, he also rejected it as inappropriate. All physics faculty turned it down. As a consequence, the dean selected Physics Professor Emeritus Milton Stecher to teach the course. Stecher was then an adjunct member of the faculty after his mandatory retirement from full-time tenured faculty status at the end of the 1977–1978 academic year.

While still a full-time member of the faculty, in the period 1975 to 1977, Stecher had participated in the experimental program. He testified that participants received as a special benefit for their participation release from teaching a regular course. The only benefit he received as an adjunct was payment of the adjunct's salary.

Subsequently, during the 1980 spring term, Gelfman now approached Dean Tan about participating in the experimental program, this time as the second man teaching physics 91, a required laboratory engineering course in the SHAPE mode. Gelfman had taught this course regularly every spring semester.

At the time Dean Tan was enthusiastic about Gelfman's participation; however, Stecher, in passing, later told the dean that Gelfman would be unacceptable to him for the course and the dean then told Gelfman that it looked like he would not be teaching it because of Stecher's objection. Dean Tan said Stecher believed Gelfman might sabotage the course. Gelfman was nonplussed and denied the insinuation. Yalow also asked to teach the experimental section and was similarly turned down. The dean then called a meeting for July 1 to clear the air. Present were Dean Tan, Professors LeMee, Gelfman, Yalow, and Rakow, and Adjunct Professor Stecher.

At the meeting, Gelfman and Yalow objected to the procedure for selecting a teacher for the course, this being the first time someone other than the dean was making the decision. They also sought information about the course content. When they learned that the list of experiments was less than the usual number they also objected about this. The dean maintained that if Stecher was uncomfortable with the full-time staff, he was free to select whom he would teach with. The course content was also not modified to meet their objection.

As a result of this dispute, the regular physics faculty took the following action, with the results indicated. By letter dated August 18, 1980, Gelfman and Yalow wrote the dean recording their disagreement with a number of actions taken in connection with the physics courses included in the NSF-sponsored program at Cooper Union. They protested that no member of the physics faculty had any role either in the determination that physics would be in the NSF curriculum or which specific physics courses might be appropriate. They next deplored the dean's decision that no member of the physics faculty would be permitted to teach the NSF section of physics 91 laboratory in association with Stecher, notwithstanding their volunteering to do so and their own assurances to follow the modus operandi in teaching it. They noted they did seek and find an adjunct faculty, whom they named, for the section. Finally, they protested that the technical content of the course was inadequate and explained why. In a later, December 15, 1980 letter to the curriculum committee, Yalow, Walton Ellison, and Gelfman, the full physics faculty, provided it with information about the manner in which the NSF-funded physics 91 and 12 courses were included in the curriculum without their knowledge or participation and over their objections (as to physics 12). It ended with a statement that in order to provide a professional evaluation of physics 12 they would require written evidence which describes how the course is appropriate for this program.

On the same date, December 15, 1980, the Engineering School curriculum committee held a lengthy discussion about the ongoing NSF program and, in particular, the failure to have submitted physics 91 and 12 to the committee to determine whether its action was required. A resolution was then adopted by a vote of seven to none requiring that descriptions of modifications to existing courses be submitted in writing to the committee chairman, who will determine whether they warrant committee consideration.

f. Joint degree program with New York University

In May 1977, the faculty of the School of Engineering approved the curricula of a NYU-Cooper Union joint degree program effective for introduction in the 1978–1979 academic year. As explained by Professor Knapp, Dean Tan had appointed full-time faculty to a joint committee also including NYU faculty to study the possibility of establishing such a program. As contemplated, the program would permit NYU science students, by adding a year of undergraduate study at Cooper Union, to receive joint degrees in science from NYU and engineering from Cooper Union.

At a May 3, 1977 special engineering faculty meeting the curricula agreed upon by the joint committee was proposed for approval. Certain amendments to the motion for approval were offered, debated, and either withdrawn, defeated, or passed. One amendment adopted required the total number of NYU students enrolled in the program not to exceed 20 percent of the total enrollment of the School of Engineering. Another provided that the program would have to be approved by an affirmative vote of both the Cooper Union and NYU faculties to continue beyond the 1982–1983 academic year. Other faculty voiced certain fears and objections they had received from members of the then faculty of Liberal Arts and Science about the program and distributed and commented on a resolution passed by that faculty requesting the science faculty to table or refuse to vote on the approval motion. After a motion, passed by a vote of seven to none, approving a series of meetings with the LA&S faculty concerning the program to be held through December 1977 before reconsidering the program.

At the next regular Engineering faculty meeting held on May 23, 1977, a motion passed taking from the table the resolution relating to the joint degree program. When Professor Knapp then raised the question whether the adoption of the program that day would supersede his motion to hold joint discussions between the Engineering and LA&S faculties, the chairman, Dean Tan, replied that there was a degree of urgency in the matter because NYU had already approved the program and had requested Cooper Union to act soon so it could start in September 1977. The trustees also planned to consider the matter on June 8. Extended debate followed on the implications of the program, in particular, with respect to the faculty of Art and Science. During the period from 1975 to 1979 that faculty had been excluded from the governance and participation in deliberative processes—in this instance, consideration of the joint NYU-Cooper Union degree program—as noted above.

Professor Knapp offered a new amendment to the pending motion on adoption of the program that the regular full-time students originally admitted as Cooper Union students not be permitted to take at NYU any course requirements where the courses are currently offered at Cooper Union by the faculty of LA&S. The motion was passed unanimously. Another amendment was also adopted, by a vote of four for, three against, two abstentions, which called for the joint degree program to be governed by the 1964 governance of the faculty of the School of Engineering and all published amendments thereto. Then the original motion as amended was adopted approving the program by a vote of 10 for, 1 against, with 1 abstention. Four other faculty listed as present did not vote but were included among the abstentions. A final motion was proposed and adopted by a vote of nine to none registering the sense of the faculty that the administration keep all faculties of the institution fully and candidly informed about any developments and information concerning implementation of the program.

The trustees approved the program at its June meeting, and the program was implemented at least through the 1982–1983 year.

g. The integrated master's program in engineering

An integrated master's program in engineering was voted on and approved in principal by the faculty of the School of Engineering and the board of trustees during the mid-1970s. According to Professor Knapp, some time in 1974, then Engineering Division Head Tan, before his elevation to dean on the 1975 reorganization creating the School of Engineering, had proposed a master's program for Cooper Union students permitting them to achieve both a bachelor's and master's degree in engineering by earning a specified number of minimum credits in particular subject areas over an additional year of study.

One of the ideas embodied in the concept for the program was that its introduction would not cost the school more money than was was presently being spent in Engineering School programs. Knapp publicly voiced reservations about this underlying assumption in view of his understanding of the startup costs involved. Division Head Tan called Knapp in and had Knapp explain his objections in a private meeting. Tan sought Knapp's support for the program and voiced disagreement with his objections. The program was ultimately adopted by a large majority vote of the faculty, with two abstentions, one being Knapp's.

The agenda for the regular Engineering School faculty meeting held February 22, 1977, includes a motion to be submitted by the curriculum committee for approval of a proposed curriculum for the program to be implemented as capabilities and resources are developed. The proposal takes up 13 closely typed pages listing credit requirements overall and minimum credits in various engineering disciplines. The document is consistent with Professor Knapp's testimony that the master's program required all students to design their own program in an engineering discipline—chemical, civil, electrical, or mechanical engineering—consisting of a minimum of 45 credits in analysis, systems, design, and engineering laboratory so as to provide an integrated educational experience in the designated discipline of study, with at least 18 of these credits to be at the graduate level and at least 12 credits forming a coherent concentration in the major area of study. A thesis or project in the major or minor area of study, equivalent to a maximum of six credits, was also required.

The integrated master's program in engineering was approved by the Engineering School faculty and then by the board of trustees in the 1978–1979 academic year.

Since most of the courses offered in the master's program are electives rather than required, the courses are approved on an annual basis through the curriculum committee to the office of the dean. As explained by Professor Knapp, the courses approved for a particular year are then posted, the students in the program register for them, and the dean then decides based on the levels of enrollments, which courses will actually be given. Knapp recalled a statement made by the dean, apparently at an Engineering faculty meeting in 1979 in response to a question as to which courses would be offered, that since the faculty had voted for and approved the curriculum, all of the courses for offering in the program were legitimate courses and he would decide which ones were to be offered among them on any occasion in connection with staffing requirements and other administrative matters.

At a February 6, 1979 engineering faculty meeting, Dean Tan announced the trustees' approval of the program and commitment to a fund-raising campaign for it, and that four new faculty would be added to the present 18 full-time faculty to support the master's program—they would be added over the next 3 years. At a December 5, 1978 administrative committee meeting, in response to a question, the dean commented that he was "pretty confident" that if 25–30 students applied, the program would go as it was essential to the survival of Cooper Union's reputation. The program was ultimately and is still in force.

h. Accreditation visit and report—1978

Cooper Union, as a member of the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools, has periodically prepared a self-study and has been evaluated by that body which certifies schools and colleges as meeting formal or minimum requirements relating to their academic programs, academic standards, facilities, financial soundness, and faculty. The last such study had been conducted by the Association some 10 years prior to the current study.

In the spring of 1976 an institutional self-study was initiated in anticipation of the visit of an accredidation team from the Association to evaluate Cooper Union during the 1977–1978 academic year. As the preface and table of contents to the self-study make clear, the document is broken up into sections, each prepared by the administrative head of the area covered. Cooper Union as an institution was drafted by President White, with an addendum by Provost Kaplan, the finances section was written by Vice President for Business Affairs Cahill, and sections on each school were written by each Dean, with a section on the faculty of LA&S prepared by Provost and Acting Dean Kaplan. Additional sections on affiliated activities were prepared by the dean of admissions and records, Liebeskind, the dean of continuing education, Alter, the head librarian, Graves, and the dean of students, Gore. The drafts of the sectional reports, at least those by the academic deans before their final preparation, were made available for review and suggestions to the full-time faculty, as well as adjuncts and students who serve as representatives on the degree-granting faculties. The entire report was distributed to these elements of the Cooper Union community and copies placed in the library.

A visiting evaluation team, consisting of six professors and administrators in academic and business areas from middle Atlantic colleges and two presidents of art schools representing the National Association of Schools of Art, visited Cooper Union on 3 days in April 1978. Shortly therafter the team issued a confidential report to the Cooper Union community representing its views as interpreted by the chairman, Clarence C. Mondale, professor of American civilization, George Washington University.

In the report, the team commended certain aspects of the institution and also reviewed its serious problems. It commended the competence and completeness with which the trustees, the president, and the administration have managed accounting and financing, the condition of the physical plant, the quality of teaching and of the students, and the quality of the academic programs. It also noted favorably the unusual loyalty to the institution among all segments of the Cooper Union community, the fact that the administration and Union had settled on a contract, and the quality of the library.

The serious problems the team discussed had to do with (1) faculty morale; (2) faculty governance, with special emphasis on the governance of the faculty of the Liberal Arts and Sciences, and student governance; (3) long-range planning; and (4) the library consortium. Less serious was the need for review as to policy as it relates to adjunct faculty and the self-study document itself.

With respect to faculty morale, the team comments, all parties agree that the many changes in academic organization have been "rather drastic," and notes the administration argues its right to have taken actions "in the absence of advice from the faculty and senate, or contrary to such advice." The team then writes, "No doubt the right exists, but to the degree it is exercised, confidence in faculty governance is subverted, and faculty morale declines. The extreme case is morale among the Faculty of Liberal Arts and Sciences." The team further comments: (a) the many changes in faculty organization and affairs over the past few years have been attended by an overall decline in faculty numbers and influence; and (b) communications between the administration and faculty and within the faculty need to be revivified and regularized.

As to faculty governance, the team writes, it is in extreme disrepair, with the status of the faculty of LA&S especially irregular and unstable. The team's impression is that the deans of the professional schools are unusually strong and the faculty unusually weak, a fact which it attributes to such causes as the struggle over unionization, the abolition of departments, a seeming drift toward increased autonomy in each of the schools, and some indifference among some of the faculty to the often boring details of management. The team faculty members they talked to argued that they had not been fully participant in their own affairs, and there seemed to be no present provision for faculty review of institutionwide academic policies and priorities. As to the faculty of LA&S, in particular, the team writes, "Reduced by approximately fifty percent in numbers over the past five years, this faculty is also disenfranchised and dislocated. . . . It does not participate in the determination of curriculum in the professional schools, nor does it oversee development of a common liberal arts curriculum." And the team notes its fear of the cooperative agreements with NYU, further decline in its numbers, and the deep split between the scientists and mathematicians on the one hand and humanists and social scientists on the other.

After reviewing its concerns for the lack of attention in the self-study to student governance, the lack of long-range planning (in which it asserts the faculty must be a major contributor), and its doubts about whether the library consortium will in fact provide improved library service to the institution, the team criticized the lack of a general policy statement on the appointment and status of adjunct faculty. (It had earlier noted that the faculty consisted of 48 full-time and 76 adjunct members, with adjuncts in the Schools of Art and Architecture teaching approximately 60 percent of the total credits offered in these curricula.)

Finally, the evaluation team expressed its disappointment in the process followed in the development of the self-study and in the document itself. As to the process, the team was disappointed that so little was done to assure active and full participation from all segments of the community—many faculty and students feeling that the document did not accurately represent their interests and perceptions. The team was also disappointed by the "top down" procedure followed. The process of an administrator's giving his version of affairs under his charge and then asking, in effect, if there were any objections did not make for a candid exchange on the issues. As to the document itself, the team wrote they generally found themselves handicapped by the scantiness of the data in and incident to the self-study.

President White, in his May 22, 1978 written response to the Middle College Association on receipt of the report, took issue with what he characterized as an appearingly simplistic comprehension of the institution's problems and an inadequate understanding of the demands placed on Cooper Union by the altered circumstances of the past decade.

2. Curriculum

The charge of the committee and procedures for adoption of curricula, as set forth in the 1964 governances and as continued basically unchanged in the 1978 published governances, appear supra.

With respect to the operations of the committee in the Schools of Art and Architecture, the circumstances under which Professor Wurmfeld assumed its chairmanship in 1973, are described supra. Wurmfeld continued as chairman until 1981, after 1975 as chairman of the separate committee for the School of Architecture. As explained by Wurmfeld, the actual working of the committee generally followed the procedures outlined in the governance. In Wurmfeld's own words: "I have created the list of required courses. The Curriculum Committee controls the list of required courses." Wurmfeld, e.g., acknowledged under cross-examination that he played a forceful role in making a sequence of history of architecture courses a part of the required professional curriculum for architecture students and in expanding the number of such courses offered. Another example of the committee's successful proposal of changes in required curricula in 1979 appears supra, an occasion when, however, the changes were submitted by the dean directly to the faculty without submission through the administrative committee. Yet another example occurred early in 1974 when the curriculum committee of the School of Art and Architecture wrestled with revising curricula for the "BFA and B. Arch." degrees under the impetus of President White's expression of concern for the place of general education in the professional curriculum and as its role was clarified by Dean Sadek. Ultimately, after the administrative committee, as well as President White, had made suggestions for certain increases in required humanities, social science, and art history courses above those proposed by the curriculum committee, the faculty of the combined school in the spring of 1974 approved a revised curricula, increasing by two credits, from 12 to 14, the minimum number of credits required in these areas, or other approved courses in disciplines other than the student's own academic fielding of concentration, including engineering and science, by a vote of 18 for, 7 against, with 1 abstention. The various minutes of the governance committees concerned, as well as the faculty of the combined schools, and the correspondence between the president and dean show a genuine debate among the faculty as to the proper proportion of general education and professional courses, with the president, in particular, providing guidance and support in a cooperative manner. In a letter to the dean dated April 23, 1974, President White gave his approval of the proposed modification recently voted by the faculty, noted that there still might be minor revisions within these curricula, and expressed his dependence on the good judgment of the dean and his faculty in determining final solutions. Guidance was also provided by Dean of Admissions and Registrar Liebeskind, who reported to the committee on state minimum requirements in the liberal arts and sciences for the BFA and BA degrees in architecture.

In connection with general education requirement deliberations, President White also was brought into a dispute which arose between the dean and Wurmfeld when the dean accused Wurmfeld of making comments accusing him of using Wurmfeld and the curriculum committee as a bludgeon to do a hatchet job on the humanities department. At a meeting in the president's office, which Wurmfeld attended reluctantly, believing it his academic privilege to refrain from participating, the president affirmed the faculty member's academic right not to have to respond to the dean's accusation and the matter was immediately dropped.

While its members attended the Art and Architecture faculty meetings which considered and determined the general education requirements in 1974, Professor Brown and other members of the humanities faculty expressed their feelings that the A&A faculty had voted in a curriculum which directly affected their subject areas without their input. This was during the lengthy period of their exclusion from full governance participation.

Wurmfeld differentiated between minor changes, such as name changes or recommended elective courses or even the change in subject matter of existing required courses, which are implemented without formal vote of the committee and submission through the administrative committee to the faculty, and major changes, such as formal credit changes which changed the distribution of courses for the degree requirement which are formally voted on and brought before the full faculty. The kinds of major curricula issues dealt with by the committee include: (1) the balance of credits between each area of subject matter appropriate to the training in the profession and between professional training and general studies; (2) the range of exposure within each professional subject area; and (3) the proper sequence of technical courses in the professional areas.

Apart from the occasions when the administration unilaterally eliminated curricula as a consequence of the elimination of degree-granting programs in certain subject areas and the committee was bypassed on the establishment of experimental sections of existing required courses in the Engineering School, a number of the Charging Party's witnesses testified to their more limited role in the decisions regarding the offering of certain elective courses.

In one instance, in 1975, Dean Sadek of the then School of Art and Architecture unilaterally terminated Professor William Creston, then teaching and advising students full time in an advanced film and video program offered as an elective in the art curriculum. Creston had received a 1-year appointment and was not tenured. A petition signed by over 100 students was presented to the curriculum committee to save Creston's job and the program. The matter was debated at the committee's April 1, 1975 meeting and a resolution was unanimously adopted and referred to the administrative committee reaffirming the film and video programs as now constituted from a curriculum standpoint both as part of the core program in the visual arts and as a general resource in the school. Although the dean finally determined not to farm out portions of the program to another institution, as he had initially contemplated, Creston was terminated, adjuncts were thereafter employed to teach beginning and advanced film and video courses, which were continued in the catalogue as electives, and the special situation which the faculty sought to retain of having a full-time resource person for students in the advanced film and video area was discontinued.

In another instance, where the curriculum committee of the School of Architecture in 1980 had voted approval of an addition of a 2-hour freehand drawing course in the second year, the matter was never placed on the agenda for consideration by the faculty. In a discussion with Dean Hejduk, Wurmfeld was informed that the dean was not going to present the proposed course to the faculty, the dean and the faculty having an elective drawing course the previous year.

A third instance involved an administration decision denying six and limiting to three credits a new course which Art Professor Haacke and Social Science Professor Arato formulated and taught jointly for one semester in academic year 1976–1977 entitled "Art Theory and Art Practice." Neither the teachers nor the provost nor the dean, who ultimately limited the credit value for the course, submitted the proposal to the curriculum committee. As a consequence of this decision, Professor Arato's plan to have students write term papers could not be fulfilled and the professors did not offer the course again. Still another instance related to a written proposal for an elective course in electronic music from Professors Gatza and Knapp in October 1980 to the humanities department chairman, Bowman, to which the professors never received an administration response. Again, the proposal was not submitted to the curriculum committee of the School of Engineering, to which Gatza is assigned, and where both he and Knapp are faculty members.

It also appears to be the case that, from time to time, proposals for individual elective courses, to be taught by visiting professors appointed for the particular purpose of teaching the courses, were implemented directly by the administration without consideration by the appropriate curriculum committees.

As to the curriculum committee of the School of Art, after its establishment in 1975, it met periodically as a separate body and dealt with such significant matters as a successful revision of the first year required program in 1976, an evaluation of its new foundation year curriculum on its first year of implementation in the spring of 1977, and major revisions of the video and film programs and photography curriculum in the spring of 1978, which were implemented after review by the administrative committee and adoption by the faculty and the administration. The revised video and film program sought to solve such problems as the lack of availability of video equipment as a tool in the fulfillment of student projects in the three schools and the lack of educational focus as to film oriented to visual design students and diffusion of staff into the disciplines of video and photography inhibiting educational clarity and efficiency. These appear to have been problems in these subject areas which had continued unabated after the termination of a full-time faculty resource person in 1975. Thereafter, from the 1978–1979 academic year until 1981, no meetings of the committee were held, as neither the committee members nor the dean nor any faculty members brought any proposals for curricula changes before it.

A review of the minutes of the curriculum committee of the Engineering School show that between 1975 and 1979 it considered and approved both major and minor curriculum changes. The major changes included replacement of required courses taken in the first semester of the senior year, the dropping of certain required courses for students majoring in particular engineering disciplines, increasing the credit allotment for certain courses, and approving in principle the concept of new courses in a particular engineering discipline. Minor changes included approving the introduction of new elective courses.

3. Admissions

The revised 1978 governances changed the composition of the admissions committee in the Schools of Art and Architecture. Previously they included the director of Admissions and three members elected by the faculty. Now they consisted of the dean of the school, the dean of admissions and records, two full-time and one part-time faculty, one student, and one graduate. The chairperson was to be a full-time faculty member elected by the committee to a 1-year term. The dean, dean of admissions, and alumni were ex officio without a vote. Whenever pertinent, the committee was to invite representatives of any school or faculty or discipline within the school of which it formed a part to participate in the discussion of admission policies of that school, faculty, or discipline. The committee in engineering now included one student in addition to three members elected by the faculty. The charge and responsibilities of the committee in all three schools remained the same.

Admission requirements for each of the three degree-granting schools appear in the annual catalogue which is published by the institution. With respect to these requirements for art and architecture majors, according to Dean of Admissions and Registrar Liebeskind (who testified about admission policy and its implementation at great length without any contrary testimony being offered by the longstanding faculty chairman of the three committees) they were established a number of years ago by the faculty through the admissions committee. Since Liebeskind assumed the title of dean of admissions and records in 1974 (from 1970 to 1974) he served as director of the same areas), the requirements in architecture were changed at least once by the faculty. That change, which originated in the admissions committee in the mid-1970s, resulted in the dropping of the requirement of a 1-year course in high school physics for applicants for the architecture program upon approval by the president and trustees. Since 1970, the high school requirements for admission to the Engineering School have not changed. However, some time in 1979–1980, the Engineering School admission committee did successfully request that the first part of the application form for undergraduate admission used by the three schools, after a large number of the forms had been printed, delete that portion relating to the selection of a major by the applicant. As a consequence, the form in use for engineering applicants has the majors blocked out in ink.

Taking the procedures on admission in each school in turn, as fully described by Liebeskind, the longstanding policy in the Art School has been to admit those candidates whom the faculty have felt are most talented among those who apply. Liebeskind has implemented this policy.

In 1973 or 1974, the A&A (Art & Architecture) committee prepared the second part of the application forms (described as a questionaire) which, with certain changes in problems made thereafter by the committee, is still in use in 1982. Until 1973, the completed questionnaire was followed by an art test given in the Great Hall in the original Cooper Union structure, the Foundation Building. In that year, the committee decided to abandon that test and require a home test instead. The test and a covering letter forwarding the materials to the applicant were and are prepared by the committee. That form letter, basically unchanged to date, begins, "The Admissions Committee of the Cooper Union School of Art attempts to find the best qualified students who will benefit from the programs of the school." In the third paragraph the letter notes that "the potential in Humanities and Social Sciences and Mathematics will be judged on the basis of high school records and SAT scores. We want to emphasize, however, that the high school record and SAT scores, combined, count for only 25 percent of the total admission scores." Actually, since 1970, the committee has instructed the director, later dean of admissions, that artwork counts 85 percent, academics 15 percent.

When the completed tests are returned by a deadline date stamped on the test, files including the application, test solution of art problems posed, high school transcript, and SAT score, if then available, are made up and provided for the committee for its review. At a room set aside for its use in the Hewett Building, teams of three faculty members, including at least one full-time member (only since 1981 have some adjuncts been involved), a procedure established at the suggestion of the committee chairman in 1978, review batches of the files, each member of the team placing his numerical rating or evaluation on a scale of 1 to 10 on a card placed in a separate sealed envelope since 1980 to minimize influencing the ratings of other team members, and all ratings being placed in the applicant's file folder. On the completion of this preliminary review, Liebeskind is informed by the chairman and he then personally arranges the files in alphabetical order, records the total scores, and averages scores. Liebeskind also uses a correction factor to avoid the possibility of errors in the team gradings which he devised after having been requested to do so by the chairman in 1978. Also, at the request of the chairman, in stacking the files by final grades, Liebeskind separately groups files with low grades but, where one evaluator has given a grade of 6 or more, for further review. Other stacks include those applicants rejected with no scores above 5 and those of minority applicants which are looked at again by the faculty in a final review.

Since 1978, the chairman then calls the committee to make this final review in which many faculty beyond committee membership participate and in which general discussion of the home projects takes place. Then the chairman gives Liebeskind a list of students to be admitted and, since 1974, those applicants to be placed on a waiting list. Liebeskind's office then checks for compliance with the generally applicable admission requirements, the high school requirements, SAT test scores, and the like. When particularly low high school grades or SAT test scores are discovered, Liebeskind raises the issue of admission of the applicant with the chairman, who either agrees or not, or asks for further opportunity to discuss the case with other members of the committee. Liebeskind has never overruled the final decisions submitted to him by the faculty chairman of the committee.

As an example of the nature of faculty participation in the admission process, the minutes of the regular meeting of the art faculty held on April 24, 1979, contain a report of the admissions committee chairman, Arthur Corwin, which reads, in part, "After unanimous participation of the Faculty in review of applicants for the Freshman class, 63 were admitted (25 Female, 38 Male)."

While the record shows that the faculty reviewers have the high school transcripts and some, if not most, scores available to them, and, in fact, some of the reviewers take these documents into account in making their evaluation, by and large, the Art applicants' evaluations are based primarily, if not exclusively, on the artwork submitted and results of the home test.

As to transfer applicants to the School of Art, the application process is similar to that for freshman applicants but in an abbreviated and modified form. In a covering letter prepared by the chairman, the applicant is informed that the admissions committee has initiated a number of stringent procedural requirements in order to raise the level and reduce the overall number of the applications. It goes on to advise that the committee is looking for exceptional students who have already demonstrated their commitment by hard work. The committee will also consider the total record of performance with special attention to the institution's portfolio requirements, the studio courses in the applicant's transcript, and teachers' recommendations. A home test (or project) with problems periodically updated is enclosed. A separate questionnaire specially prepared for transfer applicants by the committee and in use since approximately 1977 is also utilized. It is accompanied by a checklist of required credits prepared a number of years ago by the office of the dean so that the applicant can determine what course prerequisites he or she may be lacking. Also enclosed are three copies of a faculty evaluation form which was worked over by the committee.

After the application is received, the transfer applicant is requested to forward a portfolio of his or her work. The request is accompanied by a form in which the application certifies that the artwork submitted is the student's own. The committee added this certification around 1978 after some members expressed some concern about whether work being submitted was really that of the applicant. After the portfolios are received, the office of the dean of the admissions notifies the chairman that the folders have been sent to the evaluation room and the chairman arranges for the faculty review. The faculty then conducts its review, without the scoring and prescribed evaluation procedures used in the case of freshman applicants, and the chairman forwards the committee's recommendations to Liebeskind, who accepts them.

As explained by Liebeskind, since 1977 or 1978, the dean of Art has not taken an active role in the admission process. Prior to that time, he was more active in freshman application final evaluations.

As to acceptance of transfer credits in all three schools, it was Liebeskind's uncontroverted testimony that this was a matter for faculty evaluation and determination. Furthermore, the admissions committees establish policy with respect to whether a particular student applicant for admission should be deemed a freshman or transfer applicant with all the different requirements for admission and evaluation standards such categorizing involves. By letter dated January 21, 1981, to Liebeskind, the architecture admissions committee chairman, Scofidio, issued a clarification of committee policy in this regard. In the letter Scofidio set forth guidelines; the freshman application and home test to be reserved for students in the 17- to 19-year-old bracket, i.e., those fresh out of high school; and the transfer application, including problem set and portfolio requirements to be made available to (a) those currently enrolled in an architecture program in another institution and who would be admitted into an advanced design year at Cooper, (b) those currently enrolled in a creative art or design program in another institution and who feel they would be able to put together a substantial portfolio, and (c) applicants with advanced degrees in other fields who feel they could submit the required creative portfolio. In the letter two instances, the applicants would likely be placed in first year design. One of the stated underlying considerations for the policy is to protect the interests of recent high school graduates from competing for places in the freshman class with older, more experienced applicants.

The admission process in the School of Architecture is very similar to that in the School of Art. The initial application form is the same as that used in the Art School. After its receipt, the committee's specially prepared home test and questionnaire are sent out to the applicant from the committee along with a covering letter which has the identical first paragraph as in the covering letter sent to Art School applicants. In the second paragraph, after noting that the ratio between applications and admissions the prior year was 10 to 1, the letter continues, "[T]he admissions committee tries its very best to choose fairly. It is quite obvious that a ten to one ratio forces us to reject many well qualified applicants." Although the letter also continues to note that the high school record and SAT scores count for only 40 percent in architecture of the total admission scores, Liebeskind related that this 60 percent artwork, 40 percent academics formula which it had established was abandoned by the committee before the mid-1970s. Nevertheless, the faculty place a number, up to a maximum of 40, on the home test when it is evaluated. This contrasts with the maximum grade of 30 which the Art test may receive on its evaluation by the three-member team.

After the material is received by Liebeskind's office, the Architecture committee receives the folders containing the home test, two-part application, transcript, SAT scores, and any letters of reference, and they are then reviewed by the members of the faculty along with a number of adjuncts. At least one full-time faculty member is among a particular small group of faculty selected by the chairman who review a segment of the applications, giving the closest attention to the artwork, solutions to the problems posed in the home test, and the completed questionnaire. On its completion of this review, the longtime chairman of the committee, Professor Richard Scofidio, who had served at least 7 years at the time of the hearing, on behalf of the committee, submits to Liebeskind a list of those students they would like to see admitted and those students to be placed on a waiting list, with the remainder to be denied admission.

Normally, lists submitted from past years were discarded after Liebeskind's office would type the current list in alphabetical order. Liebeskind did retain, Respondent offered, and I received in evidence, over the General Counsel's objection, two separate lists of names in Scofidio's handwriting he submitted to Liebeskind. One list containing the names of students, not in order, accepted for admission to the 1980–1981 academic year and those to be placed on a waiting list, in order, and a second list of transfer applicants to be admitted to the first, second, and third years of the 5-year program and those invited for interview. On its receipt by Liebeskind, his office checked and entered SAT scores on the list; Liebeskind himself noted "conditional acceptance" of two applicants who lacked certain high school math requirements, by prior understanding with Scofidio and a third applicant with respect to whom Scofidio, had written "want interview first, with him," later crossing out the name when Scofidio later informed Liebeskind, "Don't accept him."

Two other names of students to be accepted were later crossed through with the notation "reject" followed by Liebeskind's initials. When Liebeskind learned that neither had taken the SAT examination, he informed the chairman and Scofidio agreed to their removal. The list also shows, by circling of names of the first two appearing on the waiting list and an arrow, and the addition of two names to the waiting list, that the first two on the waiting list were added to the group of students accepted for admission and two applicants were added to that list to replace the two elevated. The numbers 19 and 23 in Scofidio's handwriting also appear, reflecting the chairman's way of keeping track of the total offers of admission and total number of names being forwarded to Liebeskind's office.

The second list represented the committee's final judgment as to transfer student placement after review of the home test with respect to the particular architecture design course in the 5-year sequence of design courses for which they would be required to enroll. Thus, a certain number of the applicants were listed as being required to take first year design, a course described as "Arch. 111" (Architectonics), even though they were being offered admission as transfer students from another institution. One notation, in particular, the word "accept," was written by the assistant registrar after Scofidio informed her of the committee's decision following an interview of one of the transfer applicants invited for interview.

These two lists, received by Liebeskind in May 1980, were typical of the procedures both the committee and Liebeskind followed in the admissions process during Scofidio's long tenure as committee chairman.

In the Engineering School, the current freshman application form and questionnaire were designed by the admissions committee some years ago. The first part of the application, it will be recalled, is common to all three schools, and was modified to remove the listing of a major choice for engineering applicants. The second part of the freshman application (or questionnaire) was redesigned some 5 years before the hearing when the committee invited Visiting Professor Harrisberger to attend discussions of what factors, other than academic scores, might be useful in making an admission decision or might be substituted for an oral interview. As a result of those discussions, the application was redesigned.

Just as in the case of candidates for art and architecture, Engineering applicants were required, up to 1972 or 1973, to take a battery of tests in the Great Hall consisting of achievement tests in physics, chemistry, mathematics, and spatial relations. In those years a qualifying score was computed, based on high school average and SAT scores, and applied as a cutoff to determine whether or not to invite students to take the test. Liebeskind decided in 1971 not to limit admittance to the achievement tests. Around 1973, Liebeskind proposed to the committee that the spatial relations test be dropped because the college board was no longer producing it; that, since many applicants had not taken both high school physics and chemistry by the time of the test, they be given the choice of either; and, further, that the Cooper Union administration of the test be discontinued but students take the test under college board auspices at their local high school. These changes were approved and the committee then designed the questionnaire (part II of the application) which has since continued in use, as later modified.

At the time the questionnaire was redesigned, the committee also determined to have borderline candidates interviewed, using Dean Liebeskind, an alumni representative on the committee, faculty committee members, Dean Tan, and Dean of Students Gore for this purpose.

The committee has applied a mathematical formula throughout Dean Liebeskind's tenure to make admission decisions. It has changed a number of times over the years as a result of periodic validity studies the committee requested Liebeskind's office to undertake to determine the correlation between students' performance (grade point average) at the end of the freshman year and each of the different factors, which were considered in the formula, such as high school average, the SAT math and verbal scores, and the achievement test scores in math, chemistry, or physics. As a result of these studies and the committee's approval of the results, different weights were assigned to the various factors which went into the mathematical formula and the new formula was then applied to a new class of applicants for first year admission.

The most recent formula in use at the time of the hearing appears in a memorandum dated January 28, 1982, from the committee chairman to the Engineering School faculty. Professor V. A. Guido, the chairman, sets forth the formula used for admission of students to the fall 1981 freshman class. It is a composite score, assigning varying weights to, and totaling, the various components previously described, and divided by 10. The memo then advises that on December 4, 1981, the committee approved a motion permitting each curriculum group to independently recommend an admission's formula to it, which the committee could then either approve or disapprove. The memo concluded with a request that any faculty recommendations for an admission formula, accompanied by justification, had to be submitted no later than February 5, 1982. Liebeskind testified that the motion had been adopted on December 4, 1981, over his objection and contrary vote. (Unlike the voting composition of the Art and Architecture admissions committees, the dean of admissions retains a vote on the engineering committee.)

As to transfer students into engineering, the applications and grade transcripts are received up to June 1, after which time they are forwarded to the office of the dean where a meeting is held at which there are faculty representatives from each of the engineering disciplines. The faculty present in the applicant's discipline review the files and make the admissions decision as well as noting in the applicant's folder the number and nature of transfer credits to be allowed. No waiting list of transfer applicants is maintained. If the reviewers find the applicant lacking the equivalent of the institution's first year engineering curriculum, the student will not be admitted. Liebeskind described the dean's participation as that of a mechanical engineering faculty reviewer in the absence of such representative, but never as an administrator.

With respect to the size of entering classes in each school, Dean Liebeskind credibly testified that the deans advised and set rough guidelines, or goals, for optimum numbers of students, but that the admissions committee pretty well admitted as many students as they felt should be admitted in any particular year. For example, in the Art School, which scheduled 4 sections of freshmen, the dean sought 16 as an optimum number for each section. Yet, in the past 10 years, while the figure of 66 has not been exceeded, the total has in particular, years gone as low as 50 or 54. In engineering, before the mid-1970s, the entering class had 5 sections of 25 each. When 1 of the majors was eliminated in 1975, the dean advised Liebeskind to raise the optimum figure to 30 for each of 4 sections. Thus, today, 120 is the target for the size of the freshman class.

Each admissions committee also works with Dean Liebeskind in drawing up an admissions calendar. The dean's office annually supplies various chronological dates to the faculty after Liebeskind discusses his proposal with the committees, setting deadlines on mailing tests to applicants, faculty reviews, and Liebeskind's own review, all based on and working back from a generally recognized May 1 deadline for notifying applicants of their admission or rejection by the school.

4. Academic standards

Although the printed 1978 governances of the Schools of Art and Architecture incorporating all amendments made prior thereto list the deans of admissions and students as exofficio and nonvoting members (along with the academic deans) and the dean's unilaterally revised governance in the School of Engineering merely includes these deans as exofficio members without specifically denying them the vote, both deans testified without contradiction that, in addition to fully participating in their deliberations, they also vote on these committees. However, in the Art and Architecture committees, which also include two full-time and one part-time faculty, one student, and one full-time LA&S faculty member, the full-time faculty alone outweigh them. In the Engineering School committee, which under Dean Tan's revision included one representative from each teaching discipline without student or any part-time faculty representation, full-time faculty outweigh the two voting deans by eight to two.

The charge of the committees is identical in each school and is, in substance, unchanged from that contained in the 1964 governances. Academic standards and regulations for each school appear in the annual catalogues. From time to time, committee deliberations result in changes in these standards. For example, the minutes of the Art School committee for June 7, 1976, show that it discussed both poor attendance and work in studio courses falling below the 2.0 minimum and unanimously voted for inclusion in the academic requirements of the School of Art, effective in the 1976–1977 year, the following statement:

> Students whose attendance record and/or performance in studio courses is unsatisfactory may, at the discretion of the Academic Standards Committee, be dropped from the rolls of the Cooper Union.

At that time, Deans Gore and Liebeskind, although present, did not vote, but the academic dean joined the three faculty members present in the committee's unanimous approval of the standard. The minutes further report that, at its direction, faculty members were to be polled by phone on their position regarding the statement, three members who had been reached by June 9 having given their approval.

As further evidence of the committee's adoption of the standards governing retention of student status and satisfactory completion of degree requirements, the Engineering School committee minutes of February 27, 1979, report, inter alia, that, "The Academic Standards previously adopted, and which will appear in the 1979–1981 school catalog, were reviewed. Several items were modified for clarification, and are listed in the memo, sent to Dean Liebeskind and distributed to the members on 3/1/79." The minutes of September 4, 1979, report that a motion was passed in which the committee recommended to the faculty that a 3.0 GPA [grade point average] in graduate courses taken at Cooper Union be required for graduation from the integrated master's degree program. This motion, as amended by Professor Yalow in certain particulars, clarifying that the minimum average applies only to 400 level courses and all courses taken beyond the requirements of the bachelor's degree, was passed by the faculty at the continuation of its regular October 23, 1979 meeting held on November 6, 1979. (Parenthetically, the admissions committee in March, 1979, had adopted a standard for undergraduate admission into the program, at the request of Dean Tan, which required a minimum 3.0 average, but which also permitted a waiver on recommendation of the faculty in the area of the student's major interest.)

The three governances provide uniform procedures for the committees' exercise of their responsibilities in defining the grading system, recommending standards and regulations for academic performance, reviewing petitions from students, and recommending candidates for degrees. Major changes proposed by any member of the faculty in the grading system or academic standards and regulations after consideration by the committee go to the faculty and then the president. Minor changes, such as in wording for clarification, may be acted on by the committee and reported to the faculty. On student petitions for reinstatement, the guidelines for consideration of which appear in section IV,D, supra, the governances provide that the committee's actions in this area shall be final.

According to Dean of Students Marilyn Gore, in dealing with student petitions, the faculty, particularly that in the smallest school, Architecture, pride themselves on their flexibility in resolving the problems presented. In one instance, in which it was clear by his academic record, primarily in the design area, that a particular student should be dropped, Professor Wurmfeld appeared before the committee and stated he would like to take on the student and see if he could work with him. The committee approved the student's retention, and the student ended up doing very well and was able to graduate. Dean Gore, who initially opposed such flexibility in some cases, over a period of time became appreciative of the kind of thoughtful consideration that the committee gave to the individual situations of the students. In further support of the independent, as well as compassionate, exercise of its discretion in these areas, the minutes of the committee meetings of the schools are replete with instances of the varied determinations which they made on the cases of students dropped, or placed on probation, or in considering petitions for change of grades (invariably left completely to the discretion of the faculty teacher, but on occasion modified to permit a timely withdrawal or incomplete grade only on approval of the dean and which must be completed expeditiously or result in a failing grade). The range of possible actions regarding students in serious academic difficulty appears by code in the engineering committee minutes of June 12, 1980. They include probation, readmitted and on probation, decision pending before September meeting, removed from probation, absolved of any unsavory status, special considerations (which are then annotated), continue on probation, and denied readmittance. As explained by Liebeskind, no student is dropped without the opportunity of appearing first before the committee. Students placed on probation are also under the continued guidance and counseling of their faculty advisor who periodically reports to the committee on the student's academic progress.

In an effort to show the limited control the faculty exercised in the area of academic standards, the General Counsel adduced evidence with respect to two students who received failing grades in the fourth year architectural design course yet, with the apparent aid of the dean, were able to complete the required course work, including the simultaneous completion of both the fourth and sequential fifth year design courses in the following year, and graduate with their class at the completion of the fifth year. This incident became a matter of some dispute and received considerable attention from both the General Counsel and Respondent at the hearing.

Professor Wurmfeld testified that the grades for each student in his classes are turned in to the dean, who countersigns the sheet containing them, and the grades are then issued. In this instance, in academic year 1976–1977, he gave a final grade of F for the spring semester to two students, R.S. and S.S. in "Arch. 141, Design IV," listed for six credits. The next year, 1977–1978, these students did not repeat the course, but instead were in the fifth year course, "Arch. 151, Thesis," listed for 10 credits. The inference Wurmfeld drew is that the students had been promoted over his issuance of the failing grades and were permitted to take the last in the sequence of design courses without having satisfactorily completed a required prerequisite. Wurmfeld is the full-time faculty member who is aided by four adjuncts in Arch. 141, while Dean Hejduk is team leader and one of two full-time faculty members who teach Arch. 151, assisted by three adjuncts. Arch. 151 is described as a synthesis of 4 years' educational experience with the choice of area of study left to the student. Problems are analyzed and studied with the aid of faculty from each discipline and by visiting critics. Arch. 141 involves the investigation of urban programs and sites requiring the integration of form, structure, space, and environmental technology through the solving of individual problems. Each course thus has an extensive studio component.

On June 9, 1977, Ysrael Seinuk, the faculty chairman of the academic standards committee in architecture, wrote Dean John Hejduk reporting that at the committee meeting of June 8 the two students had registered a complaint about their failing grades, claiming an apparent personality problem with the head instructor who had announced they would fail regardless of work which quality warranted a passing grade. The dean forwarded the letter to Wurmfeld for his comments. Wurmfeld wrote Seinuk responding point by point to the students' complaints, in particular noting the ample notice they had received of the risk they were facing from their failure to attend studio and the poor quality of the uncriticized work, and listing the uniformly failing grades given to the students by each of the other adjunct instructors. There were no further communications.

Both students not only had academic difficulties, but S.S., in particular, had emotional problems as well which were disruptive in the academic environment. Professor Robert Slutsky, at the time a full-time member of the architecture faculty, discussed S.S.'s academic and behavioral problems with Dean Hejduk on a number of occasions, once recommending his suspension for a year. To the dean, who did not tesitfy, Slutsky attributed the response that he wanted to get S.S. through the school as quickly as possible without having S.S. cause additional trouble, to the extent of permitting him to retake the second semester of Arch. 141, which he had failed, simultaneously with Arch. 151.

In the fall of 1977, both the dean and Slutsky taught, with others, Arch. 151, and the dean was the head instructor as well in Arch. 141, Wurmfeld being on leave at the time. Slutsky acknowledged that S.S. attended his Arch. 151 classes but that by spending every day in the studio could have done repeat work in Arch 141, with some overlap of time. Both R.S. and S.S. had been placed on probation and, by academic rules would have been limited to 18 credits a semester, and in no case more than 20. Yet, the transcripts of R.S. show he received 23 credits in the fall 1977 semester and 21 in the spring semester. R.S. received a grade of A and S.S. a grade of D in Arch. 141 in the fall of 1977 under the head instruction of Dean Hejduk. Dean Liebeskind acknowledged that it was unusual for a student on probation who failed a design course to be permitted to take the next course in the sequence simultaneously with repeating the design course he failed, for a total of 16 credits only in design courses.

Dean of Students Gore recalled S.S. and problems with his conduct. She saw him at Dean Hejduk's request because of the disruptive nature of his behavior. She also participated in an academic standards committee meeting which considered the status of S.S., when he was in his fourth year, and at which a decision was reached to permit him to complete his studies. Student R.S., who she recalled having unsuccessfully attempted to convey unfair treatment by the faculty in design courses, was also permitted by the committee to continue his studies and to graduate.

With respect to student status, generally, Dean Liebeskind testified that, after the committee meets and votes, his office acts to implement the committee's decision after receiving a copy of its minutes. He explained that the committee operates substantially in the same fashion in each of the schools. With respect to granting of degrees, Dean Liebeskind's office maintains a credit audit for each student. At the conclusion of the final semester, his office will check to see that all graduation requirements have been met both with respect to total credits as well as distribution of credits in the different required areas. A list of all the students who meet graduation requirements is then prepared and in May is presented to the committees and then to the full faculty for their respective approvals.

Counsel entered a stipulation on the record that the academic standards committee in each of the three schools, and in the predecessor combined Art and Architecture School, has had the same responsibilities and authority in the period 1969–1970 to 1973–1974 that it has exercised since that time.

5. Student activities

It will be recalled this committee is a joint committee. Under the 1978 governance it now consists of one faculty member elected by Engineering, one member elected by Art or Architecture (alternating each year), the dean of students, and one student from Art, one from Architecture, and two from Engineering, who shall serve for 1 year. The students shall be elected in elections in which student participation shall be at least 50 percent in the school each represents. The committee's charge has remained the same. See section IV,D, supra.

Dean of Students Marilyn Gore testified that she is the chairperson. She believed the governance established this, but it is silent on who is chairperson and how that person is selected. According to Gore, the committee also includes a faculty representative from each school, and is not limited to two as provided in the governance. Furthermore, the committee in operation now includes three students from Engineering, two from Art, and one from Architecture, each elected by the respective student bodies.

A current concern of the committee is discussing and preparing a student judicial code. The purpose of such a code is to provide standards for the behavior of students, procedures and penalties for student breaches, and also to ensure that students get due process when accused. Gore prepared a first draft, which was then modified with committee input. In academic year 1981–1982, the committee had already met four times and a fifth meeting was planned for a few days after Gore's testimony. The first draft was begun in January 1977. After committee revision and approval, it was submitted to the faculty-student Senate which referred it back to the committee for further revision. Gore first attempted to meet senate objections; the committee then discussed it again, made its own revisions, and it was resubmitted to the Senate in November 1981. At the time of the hearing, Gore had not received any formal word on senate actions. Since all members appear to participate equally, this is one governance committee, probably the only one, on which the full-time faculty either does not have a member officiate as chairperson or constitute a voting majority among the membership as actually constituted.

Apart from the work of the Student Activities Committee, individual faculty members act as advisors to various student extracurricular activities clubs. For example, Professor of Humanities Thaddeus Gatza advises the Cooper Pro Musica, a student musical organization. Besides performing with the group, Gatza advises the student president concerning its funding, and arranges rehearsals and musical programs, spending an average of 3 hours a week in this role. Gatza stressed, however, that the students manage their own activities and that annual funding is provided by a joint activities committee of students to which student leaders of the various extracurricular clubs apply. Gatza has nothing to do with either the obtaining or disbursing of these funds.

Professor Knapp advises another group of students who formed a production center which provides audio services for student organizations and runs the audio and lighting systems for productions in the Great Hall. This group is partially funded by the joint activities committee budget and partially by income received through sale of their services to individuals and organizations. According to Knapp, who testified without contradiction, the faculty has no input into the size of the budget or how its funds are allocated. While no tuition is charged Cooper Union students, there is a student fee, totaling $300 in academic year 1981–1982, which is the source of the funds for these activities. The faculty has not voted on the amount of the fee which was raised to its present level some time during the 1970s. Neither does the faculty have any say on the registration or approval of student clubs so that they may apply for and receive funding.

6. Calendar and schedules

Prior to the 1978–1980 collective-bargaining agreement, the annual calendar and schedules of instruction were prepared under the auspices of the governance committee on calendar and schedules as set forth in section IV,D, supra.

Up to 1975, the committees from each of the then two schools, Engineering and Art and Architecture, acted jointly in working out details of the calendar and in coordinating schedules of the two schools. Thereafter, committees from the three schools acted jointly in doing so. Dean Liebeskind, prior to his elevation to director of admissions in 1970, for most of the years since 1948, had been faculty chairman of the Engineering School committee which produced a calendar and class schedule each semester.

In 1970, the committee asked new Director of Admissions and Registrar Liebeskind to produce the schedule. Liebeskind forwarded forms for each engineering discipline to the office of the dean, who consulted the faculty members as to their availability and how a particular class was to be scheduled, e.g., whether on 3 consecutive hours or 1 hour on each of 3 separate days. Liebeskind would then prepare a schedule from the completed forms, and it was posted so that faculty members could review it and make suggested changes for implementation by Liebeskind.

In February 1970, the full engineering faculty adopted a statement of policies and guides relating to class and examination schedules in the School of Engineering and Science which it had received from the calendar and schedules committee. At least two changes were made in the statement after its receipt by the faculty. The standards and guide the statement embodies have recently been brought to the attention of the faculty by Dean Tan following termination of the bargaining agreement and the withdrawal of recognition. They relate to such matters as when in the day certain classes should be scheduled, reasonably balancing the workload for students and avoiding excessive staff member load on any one day, limiting classes between certain hours, and the prcedure, process, and location of review of the registrar's proposed schedule by faculty members. Dean Liebeskind followed these guidelines when he prepared the schedules.

The 1970 statement also contains a foundation for an effective examination schedule. Final exams are not given in the Art School and are rarely given in Architecture. They are given in Engineering, and the principles contained in the statement guide Liebeskind in preparing the proposed examination schedule which he submits to the dean's office for the faculty's review. Some faculty contact him directly to make changes and he complies with those requests.

For the 3 or 4 years up to the time of Liebeskind's testimony in February 1982, or roughly since the collective-bargaining agreement became effective and after withdrawal of recognition, the responsibility for completing a master class schedule, at least in the Engineering School, has been given to Associate Dean Hollander. The faculty have been invited to come into the room where the schedule is being worked on and to more or less schedule their courses in different time slots as they wish. Dean Liebeskind has observed Dean Hollander working on the schedule and faculty in the room, placing and moving class descriptions on a large, 3- by 5-foot mockup of the master schedule. Students have also made suggestions on time slotting of courses. Conflicts in time between courses are resolved between the faculty affected and Associate Dean Hollander. According to Liebeskind, under the current system there is greater faculty participation in the preparation than when he drew it up.

The academic calendar lists the dates of beginning and ending of classes each semester, recess dates, final examination dates, and graduation.

In previous years, after preparation of an academic calendar by each committee, if there were discrepancies between them the faculty-student Senate resolved then so that a common calendar for all divisions of the institution could be produced. Then, in negotiations for the collective-bargaining agreement, an understanding was reached that as dean of admissions and records, Liebeskind would prepare the calendar. By virtue of article XXIII of the agreement, see section IV,F, the committee on calendar and schedules was not continued in the 1978 governances. Instead, article IV of the agreement provided that the dean of admissions shall prepare the calendar and it shall remain substantially the same as at present. There shall be no change in the number of holidays and number of weeks in the academic year. And the faculty shall not be required to be in residence between June 15 and Labor Day of any academic year.

After the contract expired, the institution went back to the committee structure only now with three formal faculty committees reflecting the three schools. Liebeskind submits to them a list of significant dates during the academic year, including holidays and dates of religous observance, and a typical calendar. The committees meet and agree on a calendar for each school, resolving any discrepancies between them; the faculties then approve the calendars and, if any discrepancies still survive, they are resolved in the Senate.

7. Academic freedom and tenure

The charge of the committee and the principles and procedures concerning academic freedom and tenure appear in section IV,D, supra, and in appendix III to the 1964 faculty policy manual. The committee was a joint committee made up of four senior faculty members from each of the two schools, Engineering and Art and Architecture, elected by the joint faculties. In formulating a code to be followed in proceedings concerning the fitness of a member of the faculty, embodied in the procedures described in section IV,D, supra, the committee was guided by and followed closely the principles adopted jointly by the Association of American Colleges and the American Association of University Professors. After adoption by the faculty the procedures were approved by the trustees.

Professor Ralph Knapp, who served on the joint committee for a 3-year term in the early 1970s, alluded to what he and other members conceived to be a serious defect in its operation. This was a merger of the investigative and adjudicatory functions in the same body in that the committee both investigated and heard matters which in its view warranted formal proceedings. As Knapp explained, "It was not possible for the committee to do both functions and remain uninvolved in the issue . . . you were already prejudging the issue." This problem, although discussed a number of times by the committee in its private deliberations, was not resolved.

Professor Knapp described the three areas of activity allowed to the committee under the 1964 governance and appendix III as (1) alleged violations of academic freedom, (2) alleged violations of due process, and (3) alleged violations of adequate consideration. He later expanded that list to include consideration of dismissal of a tenured faculty member for alleged inadequate cause. In appendix III adequate cause was defined to mean professional incompetence due to either physical or mental disability; professional incompetence manifested by gross negligence of duty or grave and continued disregard of scholarly standards or professional responsibilites; conviction of an act constituting a violation of law and involving moral turpitude; or a change in academic program, approved by the faculty, administration, and trustees, or a demonstrably bona fide financial condition that necessitates the abolition of the position. It will be recalled that in this last area in 1975 the institution successfully opposed the request for a hearing of five tenured professors whose appointments were terminated due to the discontinuance of their academic programs, the president's denial of a hearing having been affirmed by way of a court dismissal of the professors' suit to enjoin their terminations pending a hearing.

In 1969, Professor of Physics Milton Stecher and then Humanities Professor Leo Kaplan had become co-chairmen of the joint committee. During the period 1969 to 1975 it dealt with seven cases raising all of the issues described by Professor Knapp. In 1969, three cases came before the committee. In one of them, the committee's recommendation that a letter from the Engineering School dean to the faculty requiring them to disavow a memorandum circulated to his colleagues, by a member of the mathematics department, criticizing the dean's action in removing the departmental chairman for failing to support the dean's candidacy for president, or have the memo placed in their permanent files, be declared ineffective as a violation of academic freedom was approved by the board of trustees. In another, Stecher testified that the committee's recommendation to censure the acting administrator of the math department for his failure to consult math faculty on the appointment of a new member of the department in violation of article IV of the governance was also approved by the trustees. Stecher, however, could not locate any letter of censure in the case file and counsel stipulated there was none. Furthermore, a group of outside consultants appointed in mid-1969 to review "a problem . . . related to the Department of Mathematics" and to make recommendations for its solution made a recommendation, inter alia, approved by the president and trustees in October, that gratitude be expressed to the acting math department administrator for undertaking an otherwise thankless task and he continue to serve until a new administrator be located and employed. By letter dated January 9, 1970, President White relieved the acting administrator of his duties, assumed the duties himself for the second semester, with the assistance of another member of the faculty until the search for a permanent head was concluded, and ended by expressing gratitude to the acting head for his leadership and patience. In the third matter referred to it that year, the committee's jurisdiction regarding a complaint of disenfranchisement by the humanities department was disputed by interim President Heald and, as a result, the committee only acted informally prior to new President White's decision later in the year to give them the vote on governance committees.

In 1970–1971, the committee, after hearing, successfully recommended reappointment for the next academic year without prejudice of a chemical engineering professor whose academic freedom had been violated. The following year, the committee, affirmed by the trustees, denied a hearing and dismissed the claim of the same professor on his nonrenewal, having satisfied itself that he had received academic due process.

In 1973–1974, the board of trustees approved a committee recommendation that another chemical engineering professor had not been denied renewal and tenure because of insufficient consideration, the committee concluding that all relevant documents and information respecting the professor's status and tenure application had been given due consideration. In his testimony about this case, Professor Knapp noted that it was beyond the committee's jurisdiction to involve itself in the substantive matter of the administration's denial of tenure to the professor in spite of his having received a favorable departmental recommendation on a second vote of the senior faculty members in his department after an apparently inconclusive first vote had been taken. On the first vote, the departmental chairman had been in favor and the only other tenured member against. By the time a second vote had been taken at the professor's request, a third member of the department had received tenure and was thus now eligible to vote. He voted in favor, and the other two votes continued to remain split.

The last case considered by the committee arose in 1974. Professor of Art Thomas J. Gormley complained in 1974 that a decision of the president to deny him tenure was due to his union activities and therefore a violation of his academic freedom.

Gormley had been teaching full time in the combined Art and Architecture School since 1970. In 1971 he was appointed acting head of the department of graphic design, a post from which he later resigned and then reassumed. By academic year 1972–1973, Gormley was an assistant professor. Under the faculty policy manual, if tenure was to be denied him, the administration was obligated to notify him 12 months prior to the completion of his fifth year of service, thus by the end of the spring term of his fourth year, in 1974. That spring, the Division of Art tenure committee unanimously voted to recommend Gormley and a colleague, the Art Division head, and initially that Art and Architecture School dean, Sadek, recommended in writing Gormley's tenure, along with that of the other candidate, Professor Kadish. Then, unexpectedly, Dean Sadek a month later withdrew his previous apparently unqualified support for Gormley. In a second letter to President White, in which he referred to informal individual discussions with the committee members and division head, held as a result of a recent conversation with the president, characterizing their support for Gormley as lukewarm at best, Sadek concluded he would not give other than "pro forma" support to Gormley's candidacy. President White, who had not approved Dean Sadek's initial letter of recommendation for Gormley, wrote Gormley on June 14, 1974, officially informing him that on June 12 the board of trustees decided not to grant him tenure and that his appointment for 1974–1975 was a terminal one.

Gormley's complaint to the committee was grounded on a belief that Dean Sadek's change in position was related to his anger at Gormley's support, by his vote and remarks at the senate meeting for the Union, and to Gormley's alleged failure to clarify his position in a conversation the day following the senate vote. Gormley testified that Sadek had been hysterical in a later telephone conversation in which he referred to Gormley's vote, to Gormley's tenure candidacy, and to his view that Gormley's stand on the matter was not going to sit very well with the administration. Gormley also felt the procedure invoked by the dean in reevaluating his tenure recommendation had been improper in that he had learned from various of the committee members approached by Dean Sadek that they had not held any real "discussions" about his qualifications as claimed by the dean in his second letter.

The committee, under Professor Stecher's chairmanship, proceeded to investigate the matter, including interviewing various faculty and administration figures. Gormley submitted a lengthy recital urging a hearing on his complaints, as well as affidavits from two members of the committee. Gormley also sought and received a statement of reasons for denial of tenure from President White in which White relied on a policy adopted by the board of trustees in 1973 recognizing the unusually high proportion of faculty on tenure, the long-range educational and financial implications arising from this situation, and the urgent necessity to act firmly to correct it by limiting tenure to only those with the most outstanding credentials. (White referred to 10 other faculty members besides Gormley who were denied tenure in the past 2 years, most of whom also had the support of their colleagues.)

At the urging of Professor Robert Slutzky, a member of the committee and a strong supporter of Gromley's position, additional meetings on the case were held with the provost, dean, and others. At these meetings, two of the committee members who continued to participate in its deliberations were unavailable (of the original seven members, two withdrew from consideration because of then direct involvement on the Division of Art tenure committee in recommending Gormley's tenure and one could not participate because of a personal tragedy).

Ultimately, a committee majority, consisting of Stecher and two others, who attended interviews and participated in early deliberations and whose views were later polled, determined to take no further action in the complaint, and Slutzky dissented. The committee's decision was announced in a lengthy document issued in February 1975 and signed by the chairman, and Slutzky issued a one-page dissent. The majority concluded that while it considered Dean Sadek's second letter to the president as a tortuous, ambivalent document, it learned he wrote it after failing to secure from Gormley's colleagues the necessary overriding reasons to convince the president, and it had no effect on the president's disapproval of tenure. Nevertheless, the majority went on to deplore the absence of a statement concerning standards of performance, as well as criteria and procedures for evaluation of tenure candidates, which led to an evaluation in Gormley's case pervaded by ambivalence and ambiguity.

Slutzky's minority report stressed that only Stecher and he had heard the entire evidence, including meetings at which crucial evidence was presented. He also questioned whether a prehearing was necessary at all since the faculty policy manual does not clearly outline the procedures regarding termination of probationary appointments, suggesting that a formal proceeding may have been Gormley's procedural right.

Later, Stecher released an open letter to Slutzky in which he dealt in detail, point by point, with Slutzky's arguments. The Stecher-Slutzky debate mirrored a deep divisiveness within the overall faculty about the outcome of the Gormley complaint, an apparent majority of the full-time staff favoring a formal hearing so that the charges could be aired and put to rest once and for all in the full light of an open on-the-record confrontation between Gormley and the tenure committee on the one hand and the administration representatives on the other. In part, further faculty involvement with the issue also probably reflected, to a certain extent faculty views favoring and rejecting collective bargaining as a means of dealing with issues which seemed to place administration and faculty in an adversary position. Stecher himself admitted strong antipathy to unionization, while Slutzky was a member of the Union's executive committee. Indeed, a conflict in testimony arose with respect to whether or not Slutzky told the provost in Stecher's presence that if things go easy with Gormley, things would go easy over the bargaining table, Stecher's asserting and Slutzky's denying the statement was made. I deem it unecessary to resolve this conflict since the question of fact presented is not germane to the legal issue presented by the Gormley complaint as to whether the faculty exercised managerial authority over matters involving claimed breaches of academic freedom and due process on tenure considerations.

Gormley remained unsatisfied with the result and continued to seek a formal hearing in unsuccessful direct correspondence with President White and by taking the matter to the Senate for its input as an advisory body to the president. The Senate voted to bring the matter before a joint meeting of the faculty on May 13, 1975. At this meeting, tensions ran high. What transpired next is pieced together from Gormley's and other witnesses' testimony and a review of the minutes in evidence and is not entirely clear. Yet, the major points are sufficiently comprehensible to describe them here.

At the meeting, both Stecher and Slutzky spoke to their respective reports. At some point a motion was introduced and carried calling for the resignation of the committee and the election of a new ad hoc committee, and a separate motion was also adopted by a vote of 43 to 16 that it immediately convene a hearing on Gormley's complaints. Gormley recalled that President White left the chair and the meeting before the votes. Apparently, the members of the committee present, including Stecher, resigned. Ultimately, six of the seven members stepped down. At the opening of a reconvened meeting on May 22, President White read a written statement informing the assemblage that "the administration will regard the election of the proposed committee as an illegal act under the governance." He went on to state the administration would not recognize it, provide it any financial support, participate in its activities, nor receive any communications from it. He then relinquished the chair. The meeting continued with the secretary, Professor Bowman, serving as chairman pro tem. It was ruled that a quorum was present. After a speaker was applauded for criticizing the administration for now emasculating the AF&T committee after continually whittling down the structure and strength of the governance, another professor moved to censure the president. The motion called for a vote of no confidence in the president in view of his continuing efforts to thwart the duly expressed wishes of the joint faculties and his continuing refusal to abide by the governance. The motion was seconded, almost immediately the question was called, and the debate concluded. At this point the deans and division heads stood up, announced they would vote against the motion, and walked out. This action prompted some faculty to leave, thereby destroying a quorum among faculty members, and no vote was taken. The meeting then adjourned to May 27. On May 27, a quorum could not be obtained and no meeting was held. No further meeting was scheduled that academic year and the effort to elect a new ad hoc AF&T committee to hear Gormley's complaints went no further.

Gormley had an unfair labor practice charge filed on his behalf with Region 2 toward the end of 1974 in Case 2–CA–13549 alleging his nonrenewal as violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. The charge was dismissed, there were no further proceedings, and Gormley left the faculty at the end of the 1974–1975 academic year.

Following the Gormley cause celebre, the committee ceased to hear any further matters. According to Professor Stecher, he continued to remain a member after the abortive resignations failed to result in a successor committee, but the committee was no longer called on to do anything and it just petered out. According to Professor Knapp, the committee ceased to exist after the time of the Gormley episode. It will be recalled that in 1975 the administration successfully opposed the request for a hearing before the AF&T committee made by five tenured professors whose appointments were terminated due to the discontinuance of their academic programs, the president's position later having been affirmed by way of court dismissal of the professors' suit to enjoin their terminations pending a hearing. During the period 1975 to 1978 union contract demands included replacing the committee with grievance and arbitration provisions. All of these factors, including faculty disenchantment with the committee structure and concentration on another mechanism, probably contributed to its demise.

It will be recalled that the Senate, by voluntary decision of its membership, also ceased to function from shortly after its referral of the Gormley matter to the joint faculty until after execution of the collective-bargaining agreement. President White's rejection of the joint faculty's effort to reconstitute the AF&T committee reflected also on the Senate's referral of the matter to that body. In fact, it was at the same meeting at which the referral was approved that President White in addressing the Senate pointed out its purely advisory and limited role. The president's statement was made in the context of a discussion of the Union's role in certain decision-making matters and probably reflected some tension between administration and faculty arising from conflicts arising during the bargaining period. President White also never called another meeting of the joint faculty. Six years elapsed until its new meeting in the spring of 1981.

During the contract period, the AF&T committee was formally abolished and was replaced by various contract provisions pursuant to article XXIII of the agreement. Article II, "Academic Freedom and Responsibility," recited principles of academic freedom for the faculty, expanding on those contained in appendix III to the 1964 faculty policy manual. Articles VI, "Reappointment, Promotion, and Tenure," and VII, "Tenure," established final approval on these decisions by the president but required the dean to make every reasonable effort to secure written recommendations from faculty members who may be affected by such decisions, including, but not limited to, faculty members with higher rank or tenure, and which group could be expanded to include other faculty members at the request of the affected member. Procedural time limits for faculty notice and submission of additional names were set forth, the manner of initiation of candidacy by the administration, individual applicant, or other faculty was described, and provision for grieving a procedural defect was included. Tenure was to be determined for all faculty uniformly by the end of the member's third full year, with denial followed by a fourth year terminal appointment. Article XXII, "Grievance and Arbitration Procedures," provided for an informal attempt at resolving complaints followed by a three-step formal process for resolution of grievances and culminating in final and binding arbitration in accordance with the rules of the American Arbitration Association. A grievance was defined broadly as any dispute concerning the application, the interpretations, or the reasonableness thereof or other claimed violations of any term or condition of the agreement. In a separate clause, article XIX, dismissal of tenured faculty was limited to adequate cause and tracked the grounds establishing such cause in article III to the faculty policy manual, and in article XXI the administration committed itself to no layoffs of tenured faculty for the life of the agreement.

Professor Knapp testified to the amicable resolution of grievances during the contract's first year, 1978–1979, during which he was the Union's grievance officer. In one matter, the parties worked out a resolution of a probationary faculty member's claim of termination breaching an agreement to retain him, which included a financial settlement. In another, Professor Tulchin's grievance disputing a reprimand was resolved at the level of the dean by removal of the offending letter from Tulchin's personnel file. A third grievance, filed in 1980, claiming administration involvement in a plan of student evaluation of faculty violated the agreement, was resolved by a signed agreement in which the administration agreed to refrain from involvement with the student evaluation form, but in which the right of students to engage in such activity through their organization was affirmed.

Gatza testified that during the contract's second year, at which time he was the new grievance chairman, another grievance claiming a teaching overload was resolved at the level of the provost by payments made to the affected teachers above their regular salary.

After withdrawal of union recognition in mid-1980, at a joint meeting of the faculty in late 1980 or early 1981 called by President Lacy, the president asked the faculty to form a new AF&T committee. This new committee has a different composition from the old, including two elected representatives each from Engineering, Art, Architecture, and the humanities department, one librarian, and, when matters before it concern adjuncts, two adjunct faculty members. Deans and other administrators participated fully in nominating and voting for committee members. In March 1981, in a signed memorandum addressed to the president on the Union's letterhead, five bargaining unit members, and in a separate letter a sixth, all elected at a meeting of the joint faculty to serve on what they described as the unilaterally imposed AF&T committee, accepting their positions under protest and only to provide a voice, however weak, for the faculty, without waiving their contractual rights or rights to pursue the instant proceeding. A responsive letter to the individual letter writer from President Lacy placed the new committee under the governances and the 1964 principles and procedures concerning academic freedom and tenure.

J. Faculty Participation in Nonacademic Concerns

1. Building and property matters

The record makes clear that on matters relating to the use and renovation of institutional buildings and the purchase, sale, and lease of real estate, the faculty had either no input or no effective advisory role on the ultimate decisions reached. When the Foundation Building was renovated during the period 1973 to 1975 and other quarters were acquired for class and administrative use, the faculty was not consulted. In 1981, when Cooper Union sold the cooperative apartment it retained for its president and purchased a brownstone residence for his use at a cost exceeding $600,000 plus additional funds necessary for its restoration, the faculty learned of the transactions and allocation of funds after the fact from an institutional publication and a letter from the chairman of the board of trustees. The trustees had authorized the purchase in December 1980. The assignment of space in its academic buildings also appears to be a matter as to which the administration has uniformly operated independent of any real faculty advisory role. For example, the allocation of classrooms for use by the Art School in the Hewitt Buildings was determined unilaterally by the administration. No faculty or Senate meeting dealt with these matters. Similarly, an Architecture faculty vote in 1974 to create a faculty lounge in the Peter Cooper Suite in the Foundation Building, used for board of director meetings and other social foundations, when the suite was not being used for other purposes, was not followed by the administration. In the summer of 1977, the operational hours of all Cooper Union buildings were shortened by limiting their use to 4 days. The decision, made to conserve on energy costs, was announced to all faculty and staff in a memorandum from the office of the president. On the other hand, there have been instances of consultation with faculty on those occasions when students have requested of the dean that the normal open hours for the Foundation Building be extended. A permanent move of the faculty of Liberal Arts and Sciences in the summer of 1979 from the Foundation Building to the School of Engineering Building and its replacement in the Foundation Building by the Design Center was effectuated without faculty consultation. The establishment and location of an audio-visual resources center in the Engineering Building, including video studies, videotaping, and editing facilities and a video playback center were also announced unilaterally by the provost in a letter to faculty, students, and staff on September 21, 1977. With respect to property owned by the institution off the Cooper Union academic sites but located in New York City, leases with tenants on these properties have been entered and renewed without any faculty advice or consultation.

Two other real estate decisions of consequence to the Cooper Union community were reached largely independent of any faculty input, and one of them was made contrary to an apparent faculty consensus.

On the renovation of the Foundation Building, the planning and design of space was never raised or brought before any faculty committee or body by the administration. Professor Wurmfeld testified that although the architectural plans were posted at the school and he offered preliminary suggestions regarding the location of the architectural studio, he was not aware that the institution ever solicited proposals or that there was any bidding procedure for architectural or contractor services. Dean Hejduk formed a private architectural firm to do the renovation and informed Wurmfeld that he wanted no objections from his faculty which created additional problems in the design of the space. Wurmfeld never saw competitive design plans or proposals, and the faculty did not negotiate the architect's fees or contracts, nor did it hire the building contractor or negotiate the contractor's fees or review the terms of any building contract. When Wurmfeld raised complaints about specific design solutions regarding the elevators and ramps and access for the disabled, ventilation, and lighting, he was either discouraged by Hejduk or the problems were never satisfactorily resolved.

The disposition of the developed portion of Green Camp, the institution's 1000-acre rural special educational, recreational, and athletic facility located in Ringwood, New Jersey, in 1978, was an issue which was debated at length over the years among faculty and administration, but very strong opposition to its sale by faculty, students, alumni, and others ultimately failed. As early as 1971, the trustees announced they were preparing to close the camp because of financial considerations. A number of proposals were made thereafter by outside consultants, and faculty, among other groups, in various forums voiced opposition to the closing and sale. In spite of these sentiments, in 1973 the trustees directed that the operation of the facility be discontinued, and it was ultimately sold. Even after its sale, faculty sentiment for utilizing the proceeds for continued recreational activities was thwarted. A proposal made by the Student Activities Committee to the trustees and president in late 1978 that the moneys received from the recent sale be used to construct a permanent gymnasium on Cooper Union premises was rejected, although it received serious consideration at a subsequent trustees meeting. In a letter responding to the committee's request, President White explained that he believed the moneys were insufficient for the purpose sought.

2. Gallery art shows and exhibitions

The record reveals that the faculty had no input into the choice of art or artifacts exhibited in the gallery maintained in the renovated Foundation Building. Even when Professor Wurmfeld was invited to exhibit architectural and other drawings there, Dean Hejduk sought to rearrange the location of drawings Wurmfeld selected for exhibition. No faculty participates in arranging, mounting, paying for catalog and posters, and selecting exhibitions. At one point, the administrative committee in the School of Art and Architecture made a request of the dean to report on policies on exhibitions and to refrain from arranging any further exhibitions until the policy could be evaluated. There is no record evidence that the dean reported, and shows continued to be held in the gallery. There was, in fact, an unwritten policy prohibiting use of the gallery by full-time faculty, which Dean Hejduk suspended when he offered Professor Wurmfeld the gallery space for exhibition of his work.

3. Budgets

The evidence discloses that the faculty has had no role in determining annual operating or capital budgets for the various divisions of the institution. The parties stipulated that the Schools of Architecture, Art, and Engineering, the department of humanities, the library, and Cooper Union as a whole, each has an annual fiscal year budget running from July 1 to June 30. Many of the items included are components based on an annual academic year which begins on September 1 and ends on August 30 of the succeeding year. Faculty members from each of these institutional divisions testified uniformly that they had no input in the preparation of the budgets or the allocation of moneys to various categories within the budgets. Nor does the faculty have any input in the allocation of funds to other administrative subdivisions of the institution, such as student activities and the office of admissions and records. Neither has the faculty been consulted on how endowment funds are invested or managed.

As an example of faculty exclusion from the budgetary process, the minutes of the administrative committee meeting of the School of Art and Architecture for February 23, 1974, include a report by the chairman, Dean Sadek, on the results of budget hearings. There is no indication that the faculty participated in the hearings. The dean's report related to the tightness of funds for the next year. Materials and supplies were to be maintained at last year's figures. The contingency budget was being carried over, which meant the school would be operating on what had been saved from excess funds. However, it was possible to equalize Art and Architecture adjunct salaries and correct some inequities in full-time salaries. The dean related that the committee would receive a report in the fall as to the amount of money available for lectures, materials, supplies, etc. and allocations recommended for the various disciplines. Professor Knapp testified that, in the School of Engineering, prior to the elimination of department heads they participated in the process to the extent of formulating a proposed budget for their department and attending closed hearings along with the dean, president, and provost which fixed the budgets. Since departmental heads were abolished, Knapp has no knowledge as to how the school budget is prepared or allocated.

On one occasion, in academic year 1973–1974, President White reported to the Senate that the board of trustees had made a policy decision to change a formula used to project the percentage rates of return on net asset value used to cover operating expenses on the one hand and to reinvest capital on the other. By virtue of this change, the institution incurred a projected budget deficit for the succeeding fiscal year of $300,000. The faculty played no part in either considering or implementing this change in formula or in creating the budget deficit. In the same year, the trustees unilaterally moved to place in the operating budget as an expense item the $364,000-a-year mortgage amortization payment on the Engineering Building.

For a period of time starting in the early 1970s, faculty observers were permitted to attend board of trustees meetings. The observers were elected periodically by the Senate and included two faculty members and one or two students. Professor Knapp, who served as one of the faculty observers for a time, testified that as a result of what he learned at these meetings he reported to the Senate periodically on overall figures he had heard discussed by trustees relating to projected expenditures for completion of the renovation of the Foundation Building and expenditures for a 2-month interval. According to Knapp, these figures appeared to be common knowledge among fellow faculty members at the time. In general, the documents containing some information of a financial nature which observers were permitted to review at the meetings presented broad categories of expenditures for the previous quarter or month. None of the observers was permitted to take any documents from the trustees' meetings and they were uniformly excluded from executive sessions where personnel and major policy decisions of a confidential nature were made. Neither were they allowed to participate in its deliberations during the public portions of its meetings, acting as observers only. According to Professor Tulchin, who was an observer for a period of time, he could not remove from the board room any documents or information, even to convey it to the Senate, and he could not conceivably take notes fast enough of what was transpiring in his presence as the subjects whizzed by. Knapp corroborated this testimony.

Shortly after the union election held in October 1974, the board of trustees decided to no longer permit faculty or student observers to attend its meetings. According to Provost Kaplan, the Union had been certified, collective bargaining was about to take place, and the trustees considered it would not be appropriate under the circumstances to have them present. The provost added that there had been some sentiment, at least informally expressed, on the part of faculty observers that it was a waste of their time.

Professor Wurmfeld testified to his limited knowledge of financial affairs of the institution, for example, the various sources of its funds, not from any financial information received from Cooper Union, but from its tax returns made available to the Union by the Federal Government under the Freedom of Information Act by virtue of its status as a not-for-profit institution.

Faculty in the various schools have from time to time made requests for acquisition of equipment for use in the academic programs. Humanities Professor Gatza testified that requests he has made for purchase of audio and visual materials or records for his music courses have been honored or not depending on what the chairman's administrative assistant tells him is available in the budget for such purchases. In the Engineering School Dean Tan informs the faculty whether funds are available for purchases of equipment and other supplies. The faculty members then tailor their requests in order to come within the cost range which the dean has indicated is acceptable. Even so, of the actual requests made, normally by memorandum, in the experience of Professor Knapp, only 60 to 75 percent, perhaps as much as 80 percent, have actually been approved. Professor Knapp recalled once being denied a supply of writing pads for up to a year although local stationers were well stocked with them. For the 18 months to 2 years preceding the hearing, the office supply cabinets maintained in the dean's office have been locked, necessitating a request by a professor to a secretary, or even a work study student, to gain access.

4. Terms and conditions of employment

Prior to the collective-bargaining agreement, faculty played no part in the setting of their salaries. They were told what it would be on a take it or leave it basis. This applied to the fixing of fringe benefits as well. Furthermore, the dean of the particular division also determined the length of the contract for probationary faculty members. No committee under the 1964 or 1978 governances dealt expressly with salaries or fringe benefits.

In the early 1970s there existed a "Committee Z," a committee of the American Association of University Professors, made up of faculty members, which undertook to improve faculty salaries and fringe benefits. In academic year 1972–1973, it reported to the faculty on three meetings it held with Provost Kaplan and one held with President White and a trustee to discuss faculty salaries for 1973–1974. The committee reported administration rejection of a proposal for annual cost-of-living increases plus additional amounts to be negotiated for merit and general productivity increases. The administration made clear the average increase would be about one-half of the COL for 1972, and this was not negotiable, although its distribution among faculty was negotiable. Neither would the administration negotiate fringes or sabbatical leaves. The committee recommended no further meetings be held in the future if the most important matters were nonnegotiable. It was at this point that Professor Tulchin first sought the aid of the New York State United Teachers in organizing a union among the faculty.

During the collective-bargaining period, salaries and other benefits were set by a process of negotiation in which Professor Wurmfeld, among other faculty, participated. In the agreement, article IX covers compensation; article X deals with welfare and fringe benefits; article XI covers sabbatical leave; article XII, leaves of absence; article XIII, maternity leave; and article XVI, workload. The compensation article provides retroactive increases as well as minimum salaries for each faculty rank.

After the institution withdrew union recognition, on August 26, 1980, President Lacy announced to all full-time faculty and librarians changes in compensation for the academic year beginning September 1, 1980. Included were a percentage increase in salary, an additional promotional increment, and an increase in Cooper Union's annual contribution to each employee's retirement plan and the elimination of all compulsory employee contributions to these plans. Faculty had no input in determining the figures announced.

The governances have always provided for faculty advisory responsibility on appointments and promotions of the teaching staff. In practice this has involved the dean or division head consulting senior faculty members in the applicant's discipline on the applicant's academic qualifications and standing. However, before President White's term, this procedure was breached apparently at least as often as it was honored. For example, in one of the matters brought before the AF&T committee in 1969, the committee's recommendation to censure an administrator for failing to consult faculty on a new appointment was not followed in spite of Stecher's recollection to the contrary. At least four of the faculty witnesses who testified to the circumstances of their appointments were not interviewed or otherwise evaluated by faculty peers prior to their hiring by their respective dean. This held true for both their hirings as adjuncts and later when offered full-time tenure track positions. After President White assumed office in 1970, at least in the Engineering School, consultation uniformly took place, although often on a catch-as-catch-can basis with whoever faculty member or members were available in the applicant's discipline being asked to interview and report to the dean.

On their promotions over time to higher faculty rank, particularly to ranks above assistant professor, senior faculty at the rank or higher for which they were being considered were consulted. More often than not it was the dean who initiated the process by requesting letters from cohorts of the faculty member being considered. This is consistent with the language at page 10 of the faculty policy manual which reads, "Whenever the criteria for advancement are deemed by the administration to be satisfactorily met, a member of the teaching staff may be promoted to a higher rank, irrespective of his years of service in his present rank." Consideration for promotion (or tenure) may also be triggered by the applicant or by other faculty making the recommendation.

On reappointment of nontenured faculty, prior to the contract period, faculty input seems to have been minimal with respect to both contract renewal as well as the terms of the renewed contract. Professor Haacke could not recall any faculty participation sought by the dean of the Art School in recommending such reappointment, although half a dozen names of reappointed faculty were mentioned by him in his testimony. According to Professor Knapp, there were no nontenured faculty who came up for contract renewal in the 1970s prior to the union contract.

With respect to the grant of tenure, the faculty policy manual describes at page 43 the circumstances under which tenure is acquired:

> The Administration should grant tenure to the faculty member as soon as he has demonstrated his competence and a satisfactory development of his teaching and scholarship. The services of each faculty member in a probationary appointment should be evaluated periodically by the Administration in order to determine whether he should be continued on a probationary appointment or be granted tenure.

Over the decade of the 1970s and into the 1980s the administration weighed recommendations of tenured faculty in making this determination. Early in the decade, recommendations were sought from tenured faculty in the same discipline or, at least, the same division. Faculty recommendations were sought in writing but were also orally communicated. By the mid-1970s, the senior faculty in each discipline in a school or division were asked to meet formally to consider tenure applications and to submit written recommendations. See, e.g., the Gormley tenure procedure in section IV,I,7, supra.

During the contract period, 1978 to 1980, the procedures were formalized, broadened, and permitted greater input by those "affected by such decisions" and by the applicant for reappointment, promotion, and tenure and the probationary period was made a uniform 3 years. See section IV, I,7, supra. Even on initial appointment, appropriate senior faculty members and professional librarians, as appropriate, were to be invited to interview prospective candidates and were to be consulted prior to the making of the final decision. These procedures appear to have been continued unilaterally by the administration since 1980.

Whether faculty advice has been consistently effective in these personnel areas is another question indeed. The conclusion drawn from the evidence is that it has not. The administration unilaterally established and modified policy designed to restrict tenure and even promotion in light of other, conflicting considerations relating to such matters as economics, ratio of tenured to nontenured faculty, and age and anticipated dates of retirement of tenured faculty. See, e.g., President White's statement of reasons to Gormley on his denial of tenure in section IV,I,7, supra. Apart from the period of the early 1970s when tenure grants were severely restricted, many tenure and promotion applications have been denied adverse to majority faculty sentiment throughout the 1970s and into the 1980–1981 academic year. Provost Kaplan's initial testimony bears this out, as do the record documents showing the provost's detailed memoranda submitted to President White regarding promotion and tenure considerations in the spring of 1976 and records from 1974–1975 and 1976–1977 showing the box scores of distribution of votes from faculty through department chairman, division head, and dean to board of trustee decision on promotions and tenure for those years. Conversely, tenure has rarely, if ever, been granted over significant senior faculty objection. In one instance, however, in 1978, when faculty peers split on a tenure application, with two of three responses in the file showing they were opposed, the professor was tenured on the strong support of the dean, provost, and president and five outside figures with professional reputation in the applicant's field. Even after the contract became effective, when a dean announced a full-time opening for a faculty position in the School of Art for September 1978, and a group of four members of the faculty interviewed a slate of candidates at his request and unanimously and enthusiastically selected one for appointment, no one was hired and no real explanation was provided for this change in decision regarding the opening. The administration's unilateral termination of probationary video and film instructor Creston, over strong faculty and student objection, has been previously described supra. Dean Sadek's appointment as a professor in the graphics area, as well as his appointment as director of the design center, was made without faculty input. I also credit Professor Wurmfeld's testimony that after the count of ballots in the representation election on October 16, 1974, Dean Hejduk informed Wurmfeld, "Now you have done it. You are through. You'll never get tenure." While Wurmfeld ultimately was tenured, and, in fact, ultimately declined an offer of acting dean in 1980, Dean Hejduk's comments illustrate the degree to which administrators believed they controlled the process of decision making on tenure, even to the extent of claiming to weigh irrelevant and discriminatory factors in the process. The same may be said for Dean Sadek's like comments to Professor Gormely during the same year.

The employment of visiting professors calls for separate comment. The faculty policy manual does not refer to this title. Nonetheless, as the earlier discussion of the SHAPE program illustrates, see, e.g., section IV,I,1,e, supra, individuals were appointed to visiting professorships during the 1970s without faculty input. Aside from Dr. Lee Harrisberger, appointed in 1976 under a Carnegie grant, the record reveals that when Art Professor Hans Haacke was appointed visiting professor by the dean in 1970 after serving as a part-time instructor since 1967, there was no faculty interview or screening process to his knowledge. Professor Knapp confirmed that the faculty did not vote to recommend candidates for visiting professorships. At least four persons, including Harrisberger, received such appointments in the Engineering School during the 1970s. One of them, Professor Ivan Grabel, while on sabbatical leave from a separate university teaching post and desirous of being in the New York area, received his appointment after being recommended to the administration by one of Professor Knapp's colleagues on the faculty.

Visiting professors were specifically excluded from the certified bargaining unit. However, during the period of the collective-bargaining agreement in 1979–1980, Union President Tulchin raised objection to the announcement of the appointment of a then visiting professor to the full-time faculty without administration compliance with the consultation with appropriate senior faculty as required by the contract. After some argument on the matter, Provost Kaplan acceded to Tulchin's request, and, after notifying the Art School dean, Tulchin was contacted to interview the professor in his capacity as the member of the Art faculty within the bargaining unit whose field was most closely aligned to that of the visiting professor. Under the agreement (art. XVIII), appointments of visiting professorships were limited to 1 year for each individual and the considerable number of adjuncts holding visiting professor titles in the Art School were to have their titles changed to adjunct if rehired.

Adjunct faculty are defined in the faculty policy manual as members of the staff not employed on a full-time basis whose position does not carry tenure nor membership in faculty. There is no governance procedure on their hire, their rehire, or their transfer to full-time status. The record establishes minimal faculty role in their hire. From time to time, full-time faculty members in the fields in which adjunct faculty were to be employed were asked to review qualfications of persons referred to them by the dean and report their conclusions. The faculty members normally did not recruit, nor did they fix adjunct salaries, rank, or hours, select adjunct replacement while on sabbatical leave, or participate in the employment process as a body or in any defined way and a number were hired over time without any faculty involvement whatsoever and, on occasion, over faculty objection. The deans select them and negotiate directly their salaries and other terms of employment.

According to at least one faculty witness, the collective-bargaining agreement required faculty consultation on their hire. Although a close review of the terms of the agreement does not bear this out, nevertheless, Provost Kaplan in notes made of a meeting of the deans and the president held on September 12, 1978, reported that he had an understanding with the Union that in the appointment of adjuncts the administration would consult relevant senior full-time faculty before making the appointment, whenever possible, and faculty consultation in the hiring process in the humanities area, at least, may have increased somewhat during the contract period. This agreed-upon role ceased at the termination of the bargaining relationship. To the extent that adjuncts were brought in to teach a new course the faculty has become intimately involved through their role in helping to determine curriculum under the governance committees. Furthermore, the administrative committee has had a continuing role in recommending on the renewal of teaching contracts to be offered adjunct personnel.

Although adjuncts were excluded from the certified bargaining unit, article XVIII of the agreement limited them to 9 contact hours of teaching or three classes, whichever was less. After the termination of the bargaining relationship, the faculty became concerned with the lack of any uniform personnel policy as to adjuncts, primarily at the urging of adjuncts. At the April 9, 1981 meeting of the School of Architecture administrative committee, the circumstances surrounding its conveneing after a lapse of some 4 years having been described, supra, upon expressions of concern by three adjuncts present, the agenda was unanimously revised to deal, inter alia, with policy regarding adjunct hiring and renewal, promotions, hours, and fringe benefits. Motions were unanimously adopted (1) that the dean report to the committee his policy concerning hiring, renewal, and nonrenewal of adjuncts and make no additional acts before this policy is reviewed by the committee; (2) that the committee, after consultation with adjunct faculty, recommend a uniform and equitable procedure for evaluation of adjuncts to become the basis for hiring, renewal, nonrenewal, promotion, and the awarding of 1-year versus 3-year contracts; (3) that information be made available to faculty and students concerning contract hours of adjuncts with a view to correcting any disparities or misunderstandings that may exist between contract hours and scheduled hours; and (4) that the dean request the vice president for business affairs to study and propose ways, at the next committee meetings, in which it might be possible for adjuncts to participate in retirement benefits, health benefits, and life insurance. At the time of testimony on these matters in January 1982, the dean, who was on sabbatical leave in the spring of 1981, had not yet dealt with the concerns voiced in these resolutions although he said he would deal with them in the future.

With respect to termination of faculty, when tenured faculty are let go, if their separation is related to curricula or program elimination as was the case in the mid-1970s, the administration has been able to successfully withstand faculty attempts to participate in the process under the goverance hearing provisions. As for individual tenured faculty, so long as there has been adequate, consideration by the administration of one or more of the causes for dismissal previously described supra, the faculty has no real role in reviewing the matter on complaint of the dismissed member. As regards probationary faculty members denied tenure, they may seek procedural review by the AF&T committee, but only when a majority of the committee is convinced that academic freedom or due process has been violated or there has not been adequate consideration of relevant factors and/or cause for dismissal does the possibility exist of a formal hearing. It appears that probationary faculty prior to the third year have no recourse even to the preliminary procedures of the AF&T committee absent a claim of breach of academic freedom. If a probatioanry teacher is dismissed prior to the expiration of the probationary appointment, the AF&T committee may investigate the claim of breach of contract, but it has no jurisdiction to become involved in the merit of the nonrenewal. Aside from the procedural safeguards of due process and adequate consideration and absent a violation of academic freedom, the administration has a relatively free hand in determining whether to renew nontenured faculty, but is limited by the definition of adequate cause spelled out in the faculty policy manual with respect to tenured faculty.

Aside from the matter of calendar and course schedules previously discussed, the related matters of course assignements, class sizes, teaching load, and staffing were of concern to the faculty. The record evidence supports a mixed, generally more limited role for faculty participation in decisions in these areas. Even as to course schedules, faculty witnesses disputed Dean of Admissions Liebeskind's conclusion of greater faculty participation in determining them.

According to Professor Knapp, there are two aspects to course schedules. One relates to the courses that one is assigned to teach. The other concerns the times the courses are held. As to the first aspect, he is generally called by the dean to discuss the courses he will teach and, if there is disagreement between them, the dean's will prevails. As to the second aspect, he has nothing to do with the time schedule. It is assigned to him and he is left in the position of attempting to make changes if it is not suitable to him. This latter testimony conflicts with Liebeskind's description of the most recent process of give and take between Engineering faculty and Assoicate Dean Hollander in drawing up the schedule described supra. In view of the more complete and detailed narrative relating to this matter offered by the administration, I am prepared to credit the administration over Knapp's more limited denial, at least with respect to the Engineering School. I also have weighed in making this finding the testimony of administration accommodation generally to faculty requests to limit their teaching assignments to particular days in order to avoid conflicts with private consulting work, other projects, and the like. I credit Architecutre Profesor Wurmfeld's description of being denied requests to change time slots of courses assigned to him without his input, which he claimed were inconvenient in both 1978–1979 and 1979–1980. He was informed that it was impossible for the registrar to change the times for students in the fourth year who were taking the set of required courses.

As to rescheduling of classes already scheduled for specific slotted times, no changes may be made by the Engineering faculty member without consulting the dean or associate dean.

As to course assignments and class size there is more reason to credit Knapp. In a memo to Dean Tan dated November 30, 1978, he notes, inter alia, that "it has generally been known since September that I would be teaching two courses each semester this year. It was not until November, however, that any consideration of which courses I would teach was made known to me." In another memo of December 1, 1978, addressed to Dean Tan, Knapp expresses disappointment over the dean's decision refusing to schedule an advanced electromagnetics course because the seven students who signed up for it were deemed inadequate. Professor Gatza testified that as to required courses, he is assigned to teach them by the department chairman. What elective courses he offers is based on his suggestions and requests, which, as previously noted, are not always honored. Knapp described the process of introducing a new elective course. The faculty member will devise a course offering and submit a catalogue description to the dean's office prior to student registration. Ordinarily the course is also brought to the attention of the curriculum committee and, presuming its approval, the course is posted for student signup. It is only taught when a sufficient number of students, in the discretion of the dean, elect to take it.

Professor Knapp has been successful at times in objecting to an excessively large number of students in his courses and some adjustment has been made. On the other hand, on at least one occasion in 1978 when Knapp and other faculty objected to four student laboratory squads in a required project course as producing chaos and degrading the educational experience, his recommendation to schedule and staff another section of the course was rejected by the dean on the ground that there was no possibility of hiring anyone to teach another section.

As to teaching loads, the faculty policy manual provided that full-time members were required to teach approximately 10 to 14 contract hours per week on the average, a portion of which may be in the evening session. Under the collective-bargaining agrement, article XVI, "Work Load," defined a full-time teaching load as consisting of not more than 21 teacher-credit hours per academic year (2 semesters) with lecture course hours receiving a factor of 1 and laboratory studio course hours receiving a factor of three-fourths per each class-contact hour per week per semester. The contract article also limited course preparations to three during a semester and permitted reductions in teaching load for those faculty assigned unusually heavy nonteaching duties. It is unclear whether the practice since 1980 has reverted to that in the faculty policy manual, but it is likely this has occurred.

When the physics degree program was discontinued effective 1976–1977, and some freshmen students transferred into electrical engineering, Dean Tan proposed reducing the teaching load of the four electrical engineering faculty to accommodate for the resulting larger classes. The faculty members instead recommended the hiring of two additional faculty under 1-year terminal appointments. A copy of their memorandum was sent to President White. Dean Tan rejected this recommendation on the ground of lack of funds, but also said he was disposed adversely to it because the memo had been sent to the president. At a March 2, 1976 Engineering faculty meeting, Dean Tan cast the deciding negative vote, breaking a two to two tie on a motion requesting the board of trustees to consider an increase of faculty personnel in proportion to increased enrollment based on greater enrollment, the new 5-year masters program, and the influx of science degree transfer students.

In January 1980, Professor Knapp's written recommendation to assign an experienced faculty member to assist a new professor in the first electronics project course was not followed, in spite of significant student dissatisfaction with the manner in which the course was being taught.

On leaves of absence, there are no standards to guide faculty, there is no review by the faculty, and no faculty committee has authority to recommend their approval. Each request is considered on its individual merits by the administration. In 1977, Professor Wurmfeld's formal written request to his dean for a leave for the fall semester 1977–1978 to collaborate on a book based on his history (of architecture) course was granted by the board of trustees after both the dean and the administration had recommended it. In the same letter Wurmfeld was also notified of his promotion to associate professor. Art Professor Haacke was granted a leave one semester when he received a Guggenheim grant. He also was permitted short leaves up to a week in length for the installation of gallery shows of his art upon approval of the dean where in one instance he stated he would make up the classes missed and in the other he had procured a qualified substitute teacher at no cost to Cooper Union. The procedure is the same in the Engineering School. The president or provost recommends approval to the trustees on application made to the dean.

In one instance, a professor whose original sabbatical leave had been extended 1 year by a leave of absence, was denied a further 1-year extension of the leave of absence to teach at the Sorbonne. This last request came up in 1978 during the collective-bargaining agreement and was discussed by Union President Tulchin and Provost Kaplan. Professor Tulchin's testimony is credited that the provost refused to negotiate the further extension of the unpaid leave, stated that it was his managerial right to determine how long or how many leaves of absence the professor could take, and further stated that the professor had reached his limit and, if he did not wish to return to Cooper Union for the following semester, he would be deemed to have resigned. In fact, the professor was informed of the administration's decision in correspondence which spelled out the institution's concern for his return and the relevant educational factors which had entered into its decision, and, as a consequence of the professor's failure to return, he was removed from the faculty. The article negotiated by the parties (art. XII) provided that a leave of absence without salary may be granted for good cause provided the employee expects to return afterward. The leave may be up to two semesters and may be extended by the president. If the leave is recognized as one for an academic purpose, the employee shall receive all salary increases granted in the employee's absence. A major difference with the provision contained in the 1964 faculty policy manual is that the manual adds as a condition that satisfactory arrangements be made to carry the applicant's teaching assignments. It is presumed the manual governs present and further grants of such leave.

As to sabbatical leaves, the faculty policy manual provides for faculty eligibility after each consecutive 7 years of service at Cooper Union, at least 4 of which shall have been performed with a rank of at least associate professor. The grant of such leave is at the discretion of the president and trustees. Such leave is compensated at full salary for one semester and at half salary for a full year. It is expected the member on such leave will not accept remuneration other than his faculty salary and such prizes or academic awards given him. The disposition of the courses or administrative work of the person on leave is decided by the department head concerned in consultation with the dean.

The contract clause (art. XI) continued the definition of such leave and salary arrangement depending on length of the leave and the authority and discretion to grant such leave continued to reside with the president and trustees. A time limit for filing an application was set, and the administration agreed to grant at least one full-year and one half-year sabbaticals subject to its review of all applications, taking into account the applicant's reason for the leave, the number of previous leaves, their allocation among the various schools and disciplines, the benefits to the institution's educational program, and Cooper Union's need for the services of the applicant during the time for which leave is requested. At no time has the faculty participated in the decision to grant or deny sabbatical leave, and since withdrawal of union recognition the administration's discretion is unfettered by the language which established a minimum number subject to the guidelines described.

During the contract period, more than the contract minimum number of sabbaticals were granted in some, if not all, semesters. Professors Wurmfeld in Architecture, Haacke in Art, and Knapp in Engineering were each granted sabbatical leaves during the contract period. In Wurmfeld's case, he expressed an intention to pursue educational goals related to his teaching responsibilities as well as his professional practice, and his request was enthusiastically supported by his dean, who noted, inter alia, Wurmfeld's "forceful role in the formation of the history program." In each of the two other instances, written requests made to their respective deans were also honored upon ultimate approval by the board of trustees.

Prior to the period of the contract, there were instances in which professors were denied sabbaticals although otherwise eligible.

Regarding welfare and fringe benefits, the contract (art. X) provided for the maintenance of such preexisting benefits as Blue Cross-Blue Shield, major medical, group life insurance, pension, and disability. Presumably these benefits have been unilaterally continued to date after contract termination.

As to faculty grievances, this subject matter has been exhaustively treated particularly as it relates to tenure, termination, or lesser discipline, and covering the contract period and subsequently, in an earlier section of this decision.

One last item relating to terms and conditions of employment is the fact that during the contract period only faculty evaluations were instituted on a once-a-year basis. In the Engineering School, the dean circulated a questionnaire for faculty to complete relating to their teaching and professional activities. An interview followed and a memorandum was then prepared by the dean and placed in the faculty member's file and a copy provided the member. In the Architecture School, the dean held individual discussions with the faculty and followed up with letters for the personnel files summing up the views he had expressed about the member's activities, contributions to the school, and their value. As noted, these evaluations ceased after the summer 1980. Faculty never prepared work evaluations of their colleagues although they did evaluate their colleagues to the extent they participated in tenure and promotion considerations.

K. Alleged Faculty Supervisory Authority

Professor Wurmfeld testified credibly that no employees report directly to him in the School of Architecture. He has no role in directing or supervising the dean's administrative assistants, in evaluating or hiring them, or in recommending their terms or conditions of employment. He shares office space with other faculty and any official or institutional typing is done either by a dean's assistant or a secretary employed in his private architectural firm. The very limited role of faculty in the hire of adjuncts and the nonexisting role in appointments of visiting professors has been described. As also described, faculty had no role in setting adjunct contract terms or length of hire or renewal of hire.

In regard to faculty relations to shop assistants and laboratory technicians, these employees are supervised by shop and laboratory supervisors and/or the deans, who determine their number and their hire, and terms and conditions of employment are determined in contracts prepared and offered to them by the respective deans. While they assist faculty members by maintaining equipment and the shop or lab, instructing and supervising students in their safe use, aiding in the practical execution of student projects, and helping to resolve technical problems, faculty do not evaluate their performance, and the assistants and technicians do not report to the faculty members they assist but rather report to their supervisor, who, in turn, reports to the dean who employs them. There is no requirement that technicians who assist in engineering lab courses respond to requests or even directives of faculty and, in fact, on the refusal of a technician to perform a task the faculty reports the matter to the dean for his followup and correction or possible discipline. Faculty also have no role in advising or determining which, if any, shop or lab assistants become adjunct teachers from time to time. Faculty do not train technicians; give them work orders or assignments; grant time off, sick leave, or vacation time; keep track of their worktime; evaluate their performance; or warn them or recommend disciplinary action. Their work contact is minimal. One Engineering faculty member's complaint in 1977 to the provost about the splitting of a physics technician's time between physics and chemistry was never corrected. In another instance, after receiving a written letter of warning from the dean, issued on the complaint of the supervisor, another technician in the Engineering School was dismissed by the dean a year later. Faculty members who were asked their recommendation before the dismissal refused to give one since they had not been consulted on the technician's earlier transfer into their discipline from another one. However, at the urging of one faculty member, the dean's determination to provide 2 month's salary severance pay was increased to 6 months. At the directive of the dean to look for a replacement, the faculty in the discipline in which he had been partially employed placed a newspaper ad, interviewed certain of the respondents, and recommended the dean's consideration of two, from which group the dean selected and appointed one. Although the faculty involved asked that the new hire be assigned fully to their discipline, his duties have encompassed work in another department. The dean also informed the faculty member who had placed the ad that he had exceeded his authority by having done so without prior permission.

Although certain faculty, such as the photography professor (Union President Tulchin), may have had closer working relationships with the technician supervisor than with the technicians by virtue of the nature of the equipment and needs of the students, they appear to have no input into the supervisor's hire or other terms and conditions of his employment and in no sense direct their work or become directly involved in their supervision or discipline of the technicians under them.

The strictly professional relationship of full-time faculty and librarians has been described supra.

L. Other Aspects of Collective Bargaining Including the Management-Rights Clause Incorporated in the Agreement

In the series of meetings principally between Wurmfeld and White in the fall of 1977 which led to final agreement on terms of the labor contract, at one point Wurmfeld asked White to indicate those things he really felt he had to have and the areas he felt he had flexibility in, and Wurmfeld would do the same. One area in which White expressed having little flexibility was management rights. At a subsequent meeting White reiterated that he needed a strong clause. Wurmfeld then agreed to the initial Cooper Union demand in this area made back in 1975 and that clause was finally incorporated in the contract. Prior to President White's involvement in negotiations, during earlier negotiations the union team held with the provost, at one meeting at which the institution's management-rights clause was being discussed, Provost Kaplan made a comment that "you can't tell General Motors when to build a Vega." The Union's initial proposal was to the effect that anything not covered in the contract, without limitation, was reserved for management. The clause finally agreed to reads as follows:

> ARTICLE XXXIII
> Except as otherwise provided in this Agreement, Cooper Union retains the exclusive right to hire, direct, and schedule the Faculty and Librarian work force; to plan, direct, and control operations and the use of facilities; to modify, discontinue, eliminate, institute, reorganize or combine any department, curriculum, academic program or operation; to lay off employees; to promulgate reasonable rules and regulations; to introduce new or improved techniques, methods, or facilities, regardless of whether the new and improved techniques, methods, or facilities cause a reduction in the Faculty or Librarian working force; and, in all aspects, to carry out the ordinary and customary functions of management, provided that the same are not inconsistent with the express provisions of this Agreement.

In another article entitled "Matters Not Covered" (art. XXXVII) the parties agreed that with respect to matters not expressly covered by the agreement, Cooper Union agrees that it will consult and negotiate with the Federation prior to making any changes in terms and conditions of employment which are mandatory subjects of collective bargaining as defined under the terms of the National Labor Relations Act.

Over the period of time from certification to execution of the agreement, the Union filed various unfair labor practice charges, most of which were withdrawn but three of which were found by Region 2 to have merit. In one, after dismissing portions of a charge filed in 1975, a complaint was authorized and was unilaterally informally settled by Respondent which agreed not to bypass the Union and deal directly with its employees concerning terms and conditions of employment. In 1977, a consolidated complaint was issued in which the General Counsel alleged Respondent had failed to bargain over loss of bargaining unit work caused by its employment of nonunit employees (adjuncts) in such work and over the subject matter of the school year calendar; unilaterally increased teaching hours of full-time faculty in the Division of Liberal Arts and Sciences; and allowed the School of Engineering faculty, including nonunit employees and administrators, to consider and recommend on such mandatory bargaining subjects as teaching loads. In 1978, there was a settlement agreement entered into by all parties and the charge was later withdrawn and the complaint dismissed by order of the Regional Director.

M. The Status of Governances After Termination of the Bargaining Relationship

The governances which were revised in 1978 to remove these matters relating to terms and conditions of employment by agreement of the parties for inclusion in the collective-bargaining agreement remained in effect until 1980 when the agreement terminated and union recognition was withdrawn. Thereafter, Provost Kaplan set about revising the governances to include the material and subject matter removed in 1978. By identical covering letters date February 17, 1981, President Lacy had distributed to each faculty member respective revised governances for the Schools of Art, Architecture, and Engineering. The faculty played no role in preparing or issuing these revised documents. In the covering letter, Lacy noted some minor amendments were obviously necessary in order to bring the governances into conformity with the present structure of the school, taking into account the restructuring of the humanities department and the reassignment of its faculty members.

A review of these so-called Lacy governances show they conform to the earlier ones, incoporating all amendments made subsequent to the 1964 governances, as well as the subject matter removed in 1978. They also incorporate the actual changes in structure relating to the faculty of Liberal Arts and Sciences last adopted by the administration in 1979 after approval by the Senate following the understanding reached between Tulchin and Kaplan.

The manner in which the new Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee was organized, including the protest of six faculty members elected at a meeting of the joint faculty to the unilateral imposition of the committee, has been previously described supra.

Except for the period of time, 1978 to 1980, covered by the labor agreement, I agree with the testimony of Provost Kaplan that the various governance committees functioned substantively in accordance with the way their functions were described in the 1964 governances and that most of the amendments adopted thereafter dealt essentially with the composition of the committees and not so much with their functions. Even during the contract period, the admissions, curriculum, and academic standards committees in the Art and Architecture Schools continued to function as they had prior thereto. In the Engineering School these committees functioned in accordance with the governance provisions adopted and promulgated by Dean Tan.

During academic year 1980–1981, shortly before the Lacy goverances went into effect, an incident arose in which the Senate's vote on a matter of alleged breach of academic freedom was not fully followed by the administration. An exhibition of graphics of the Mobil Corporation had been planned for the gallery located in the Foundation Building. A student constructed a free-standing conceptual work of art which was intended as a critical commentary on the use of oil by portraying the relationship between oil and militaristic helmets and weapons. It was displayed on the building's fourth floor until the evening of the opening of the gallery exhibit when it was moved to a location outside and immediately in front of the building where it would be seen by Mobil executives and other invited guests. At some point during the evening, it was alleged that the superintendent of maintenance for Cooper Union had summoned police and firemen. While police kept students away, firemen hosed the piece into the gutter and down the drain, destroying it. The student claimed it was up to the Senate to protect his academic freedom of expression and sought an investigation. Professor Wurmfeld, the Senate president, called an emergency meeting and requested that the administration produce Dean Sadek, who was present the evening in question, and the superintendent to respond to the student's claims. After the Senate took testimony from students the administration produced only Provost Kaplan and President Lacy, who explained what happened and expressed certain regrets. The Senate then recommended to the president that the maintenance superintendent be reprimanded for violating emergency procedures previously established in the late 1960's for the maintenance of public order in the Cooper Union campuses by a joint faculty ad hoc committee at the request of the president and required by state law, and, further, that the administration also issue an apology to the student and pay his expenses in the reconstruction of the piece. The administration did pay the student's expenses, but never produced the principals involved in the incident, nor did it issue any reprimand to those responsible. Although the president accepted Dean Sadek's resignation as Dean shortly afterward, there was never any public statement connecting his resignation in any way to the incident.

N. The Deans' Council

Provost Kaplan described the deans' council as an informal body within the institution which consisted of the dean and president and which met regularly for several years to discuss and develop a consensus on various matters of academic and administrative concern.

The record shows that those persons invited to attend the periodic meetings included the academic deans, the deans of students, records and admissions, and continuing education, the vice president of business affairs, the provost, the president, and Mrs. Callcote Kindler, the administrative assistant to the president and secretary to the board of trustees, who kept her own shorthand notes of the major items discussed. Kindler retired September 1, 1981.

The meetings were held monthly during the academic year between September 1975 and November 1979. After President White retired at the end of December 1979, President Lacy did not continue to hold them in the second semester of academic year 1979–1980 nor in academic year 1980–1981. However, biweekly meetings of the president, the three academic deans, and the chairperson of the department of humanities were held commencing in October 1981 at least through the close of the hearing in March 1982. No minutes or other written memoranda were kept of these meetings.

A review of the notes of these private meetings show that the subjects discussed generally fell into a recurrent pattern which by and large reaffirmed the positions in both academic and nonacademic matters which the administration was manifesting in its public dealings with the faculty and in its decision-making process. For example, building matters were a recurrent concern. Just as the exhibits and testimony already show the unilateral nature of the administration's determinations relating to maintenance, safety, security of buildings, permissible use, official hours, and establishment of mechanical and electrical support facilities (such as the audio-visual center) and location of divisions (such as the move of the LA&S department from the foundation building to the engineering building), the notes show the manner by which the unilateral decisions in these areas were reached. In contrast, however, when the discussions dealt with matters of curricula, or other matters subject to the committee system of governance, the role of the faculty was affirmed. For example, Dean Hejduk on April 4, 1977, reported on the very good change made in the sequence for math and physics courses and better placement of English and humanities courses. Although faculty are not referred to, these changes could only have been accomplished by them under the governances. On May 1, 1979, it was agreed that Hejduk call a meeting of the curriculum committee on the problem of teaching physics to architects.

In terms of academic standards, on January 13, 1977, President White stated that the schools (indubitably meaning the faculties) should reconsider what probation means in the institution in terms of who puts the status into effect, how long it should last, and what the conditions are for its establishment. When a matter of seeking to change existing institutional policy on prohibiting internal transfers was raised, while discussion ensued there is no evidence that the exising policy described in the catalog limiting graduates to only a higher level curriculum in another discipline was ever changed. On January 31, 1978, Dean Hejduk spoke of submitting a draft of a uniform definition of an incomplete grade in view of the different standards for permitting and time limits for removing in place in each school. Again, there is no evidence of any change being made or implemented in the existing standards set by the academic standards committees although the dean's expressions of concern on these matters never came to the attention of the faculty governance bodies having jurisdiction over them.

As to the joint degree program with NYU, the four academic deans were advised to provide an opportunity to their faculties to elect a library advisory committee, without permitting them to interfere on personnel or other matters in the two institutions' areas. On January 13, 1977, the notes show, the joint degree program was ready to go to the Engineering faculty committee concerned for its approval. As to a problem of student cheating, it was the consensus this was a matter for individual faculty concern in terms of grade and not a matter for disciplinary hearing. On December 5, 1978, Dean Gore confirmed that a draft of a code of conduct for students was being prepared by the Student Activities Committees and the provost notes it should be presented to the Senate. With respect to another item relating to academic standards—change of grades—it was noted this should be taken up with the Senate as an issue of policy. At the last meeting, on November 6, 1979, it was reported that a full-time admissions counselor was being hired on the strong recommendation of the admissions committees primarily to recruit minority students for all three schools. On October 3, 1975, the president directed the engineering dean to send a memo to the faculty saying the requirements have been completed by math, physics, and distributive science students and they will be recommended for graduation unless there are substantial objections.

During the period from 1975 to 1978 that the faculty-student Senate voluntarily ceased to function, certain matters were determined by the deans' council "in lieu of the Senate," such as recommending the grant of emeritus titles at graduation and fixing the school year calendar.

Periodically, Provost Kaplan reported on his dealings with the Union, both during negotiations and contract administration, discussing as well the Union's filing of unfair labor practice charges, and noting in this regard on March 12, 1976, that in terms of the governances the committee structure is a prerogative of the administration, unrelated to working conditions.

On certain occasions, dissatisfaction was expressed as to the liberties faculty were taking in making too many unauthorized schedule changes and granting leave for student independent study in an unwarranted fashion. The deans were to issue policy statements but it is unclear whether they ever did so. On at least one occasion, Dean of Admissions Liebeskind notified a single professor on January 26, 1981, that unauthorized schedule changes which he continued to make each semester were creating difficulties for some classes and in locating students.

On certain matters of administration as to which the independent nature of the institution's decision-making process has already been established on this record, the notes again reaffirm this process. In the recurrent consideration of the accreditation study being undertaken by the Middle States Association (MSA), both the manner in which the self-study was prepared by the institution and the manner in which arrangements were made to meet with the study team and its chairman show no or ineffective input by faculty. When on September 12, 1978, during the contract period the Engineering dean disclosed plans for establishment of an advisory council of outside people and government officials—like a visiting committee—to visit the school once or twice a year, no faculty involvement in its establishment was acknowledged. In fact, on December 5, 1978, Dean Tan informed the Engineering School administrative committee that the advisory council would visit the school on December 12 and advise on its educational programs, but after faculty objection to its establishment the dean agreed to the faculty meeting the council after its preliminary meeting with the trustees. Two faculty members, at least one an outspoken opponent of the council, resigned a week later from the committee. Similarly, budgetary matters, such as an increase in student and graduation fees, were routinely decided without faculty involvement as the record has independently established.

V. ANALYSIS

The standard for determining the status of college faculty was set in the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672 (1980). Managerial employees were defined as those employees who "formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employer." Id. at 682, citing NLRB v. Bell Aerospace Co., 416 U.S. 267, 288 (1974) (quoting Palace Laundry Dry Cleaning Corp., 75 NLRB 320, 323 fn. 4 (1947)). An employee represents management interests "by taking or recommending discretionary actions that effectively control or implement employer policy." Id. at 683.

In determining that the faculty in Yeshiva were managerial, the Supreme Court found that the faculty effectively determined the curriculum, grading system, admission and matriculation standards, academic calendars, and course schedules. In addition, the faculty effectively determined faculty hiring, tenure, sabbaticals, termination, and promotion. Further, some faculties made final decisions regarding the admissions, expulsion, and graduation of individual students. Others decided questions involving teaching loads, student absence policies, tuition and enrollment levels, and location of the school. Id. at 676–677.

The Court summarized its views regarding the faculty's high degree of authority and participation in decision making in the following words (Id. at 686):

> The controlling consideration in this case is that the faculty of Yeshiva University exercise authority which in any other context unquestionably would be managerial. Their authority in academic matters is absolute. They decide what courses will be offered, when they will be scheduled, and to whom they will be taught. They debate and determine teaching methods, grading policies, and matriculation standards. They effectively decide which stu> dents will be admitted, retained, and graduated. On occasion their views have determined the size of the student body, the tuition to be charged, and the location of a school. When one considers the function of a university, it is difficult to imagine decisions more managerial than these. To the extent the industrial analogy applies, the faculty determines within each school the product to be produced, the terms upon which it will offered, and the customers who will be served.

The Court rejected the Board's distinction between managerial decisions and decisions requiring "independent professional judgment" as inconsistent with the goal of "ensur[ing] that employees who exercise discretionary authority on behalf of the employer will not divide their loyalty between employer and union." Id. at 687–688. The Court described "[t]he problem of divided loyalty [as] particularly acute for a university like Yeshiva, which depends on the professional judgment of its faculty to formulate and apply crucial policies constrained only by necessarily general institutional goals. The university requires faculty participation in governance because professional expertise is indispensable to the formulation and implementation of academic policy." Id. at 689.

The Court also limited the reach of its holding as follows (id. at 690–691 fn. 31):

> We recognize that this is a starting point only, and that other factors not present here may enter into the analysis in other contexts. It is plain, for example, that professors may not be excluded merely because they determine the content of their own courses, evaluate their own students, and supervise their own research. There thus may be institutions of higher learning unlike Yeshiva where the faculty are entirely or predominantly nonmanagerial. There also may be faculty members at Yeshiva and like universities who properly could be included in a bargaining unit. It may be that a rational line could be drawn between tenured and untenured faculty members, depending on how a faculty is structured and operates. But we express no opinion on these questions, for it is clear that the union approved by the Board was far too broad.

An examination will first be made of the faculty's input into academic matters in light of the Yeshiva standard.

The governances of the institution have consistently maintained a strong role for faculty responsibility for the educational programs of the respective schools. While the deans chair their respective school faculties, preside at their regular and special meetings, and are the initiators of a number of the items which are presented for faculty review and consideration, the collective faculties of each school have a significant, indeed indispensable, part in weighing and recommending changes and modifications in academic policy. Their most significant input is made through the operations of the various faculty elected governance committees, in almost all of which faculty predominate, and each of which has authority over a direct area of academic concern. Normally, no matter involving a new academic policy or raising an academic concern of institutional dimensions may be ultimately considered by the administration or board of trustees until it has first received faculty consideration through the governance committee structure.

The administrative committee, as the conduit for faculty curriculum proposals among other reports received by it from the standing committees, has a central role in faculty involvement not only in academic matters but in administrative matters having financial and personnel aspects. To the limited extent faculty play a part in budgetary matters, it is the administrative committee where faculty have input, e.g. in reviewing budgetary requests in various categories. The committee passes on adjunct promotions and reappointments in terms of contract renewals. The scope of its review of curriculum matters emanating from the curriculum committee is broad and fundamental, as evidenced by the list of its reviews in this area appearing in section IV,I,1,b, supra. Administrative approval of curriculum modifications which bear the committee's approval, in conjunction with that of the curriculum committee, appears by and large to have received prompt administration and trustee affirmance. On the occasions when a serious issue has arisen over curriculum, e.g., the fixing of required humanities credits in the professional curricula of the Architecture and other schools, the active dialogue with the chief administration officials which the faculty's proposed changes prompted established a positive collegial relationship in which managerial authority was shared but in which the faculty still had the final word.

The foregoing must be tempered by the knowledge that, as chairman, the dean has on occasion been able to break a tie vote by voting for or against proposals submitted to a vote of the membership. Further, by retaining the prerogative to call its meetings, the dean was able for a 4-year period to make the committee in the Architecture School inoperative. While the dean appears also to control the agenda, items have been added from time to time which reflect particular faculty interests and concerns. One such instance was the Engineering faculty's success in arranging an early meeting with the school's newly formed alumni adversary council. Many other instances abound in the subject areas catalogued, in section IV,I,1,b, supra.

The introduction of new teaching methods, such as the SHAPE program, is illustrative of an area of faculty input which shows both faculty initiative in academic policy as well as faculty divisiveness grounded on academic content leading to some faculty isolation from academic planning. The program was started by a full-time faculty member who obtained its funding. The study was announced and discussed at Engineering faculty meetings. Those faculty who were interested were free to become involved and absorb the literature. That it become a source of controversy, in which the dean finally backed an emeritus, now adjunct, professor against the involvement of the full-time physics faculty who sought belated participation, while regrettable, should not detract from the fact that it shows the faculty inspired and spearheaded introduction of an innovative experimental teaching technique into the curriculum.

As to the curriculum committee, it did not become involved in the SHAPE controversy until faculty, belatedly, sought its involvement, illustrating, I believe, another fact which bears comment as a recurrent theme in faculty participation. That theme is an informality in the workings of the standing committees which sometimes has led faculty to avoid invoking the broad jurisdictional reach of the committees. This holds true for the limited number of elective courses initiated by faculty directly with the dean which might have received different consideration by the respective curriculum committee, if not the administration, if submitted directly to the committee under the governances. In any event, it is clear that faculty determine the required curriculum, and have continually wrestled with its adequacy and breadth, effectively modifying and amending it in each school as circumstances and inclination have warranted.

The incident involving the nonrenewal of a full-time probationary faculty member in film and video illustrates another recurrent theme which must be acknowledged. When economic considerations are deemed paramount by the administration, faculty concerns with curriculum and with student sentiment have a tendency to take a back seat. It is apparent that in this instance the faculty was ineffective in seeking to sustain an educational benefit derived from the retention of a full-time faculty resource person in the field. While the record contains other incidents of an even more significant nature showing administration overriding of faculty views on the retention of programs, such as the mid-1970s elimination of the three degree-granting programs and the termination of associated tenured faculty, it nonetheless remains true that on determinations of curricula, particularly required curricula but also regarding electives but to a somewhat lesser extent, in the institutions' three main professional training programs faculty make the effective decisions. The same holds true for the establishment of such new programs as the joint degree program with NYU and the integrated masters programs in Engineering.

The earlier extensive fact presentation establishes the predominant faculty role in the decisive decisions made under the auspices and authority of the admissions committee, academic standards committee, calendar and schedules committees acting jointly, and Student Activities Committee (but to a lesser extent because of minority faculty membership on this committee).

Administration participation in the deliberations of some of these committees, notably admissions, academic standards, and calendar and schedules, through the person of the dean of admissions and registrar is extensive. Yet, it is predominantly as a resource for quantitative data, statistical studies, correlations, legal requirements, and compliance with faculty imposed admission, credit, and graduation requirements that this dean contributes to the workings of these committees. The Charging Party points to the communications between the dean and long-term chairmen which result in final determinations of the committee, in particular on admission decisions, as showing a limited faculty role in these matters. I do not agree. The faculty select the chairmen and whether by active decision or default have permitted the chairmen to conduct the affairs of their committees in such fashion. As representatives of faculty participation in the workings of these governance committees, the chairmen are expressing the sentiment and consensuses of their brethren, whether articulated or not. The fact that neither the General Counsel nor the Charging Party saw fit, for whatever reason, to seek to rebut the testimony of Dean Liebeskind on the effective faculty determinations in the areas of these academic committees' concerns strengthens the conclusion that they exercise predominant and final authority in certain academic areas central to the institution's educational mission.

One matter involving academic standards bears closer scrutiny. The General Counsel argues that the graduation of RS and SS with their regular class after receiving failing grades in the fourth year architectural design courses shows administration disregard for the faculty grading system or matriculation standards. I do not agree. First, it is not clear that by issuing the failing grades the faculty involved meant to foreclose RS and SS from doubling up the fourth and fifth year design courses in their fifth year. Professor Wurmfeld never recommended against such action although there is no evidence he was ever asked his advice on the matter. Furthermore, Dean Gore testified without contradiction that the status of both RS and SS came before the academic standards committee where both were permitted to complete their studies in their fifth year. That committee also successfully dealt with RS's attempt to establish unfair treatment by the faculty in the fourth year design course. Thus, while Dean Hejduk as leading instructor in the design courses in fall 1977 permitted these students to double up in their design course work, it would appear that his discretion here was exercised within limits previously established by the faculty itself.

Faculty participation in matters of academic freedom and tenure require separate comment. For the total period covered by the records, except for the 2-year period 1978 to 1980, faculty allegations of breaches in the four areas of concern within the juridiction of the Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee received the attention and active investigative participation of this joint, faculty elected committee. In every instance but one, of the six cases described within its jurisdiction, its conclusions were affirmed by the administration and trustees. That one instance concerned the apparent failure of the administration to censure the acting administrator of the math department for failure to consult faculty on the appointment of a new faculty member. Nevertheless, the administrator was, in fact, shortly thereafter during midyear, abruptly relieved of his duties, which, in spite of the president's expressions of gratitude to the administrator, was probably based on faculty dissatisfaction with his tenure, manifested, at least in part, by the conclusions of the committee.

The committee's deliberations and conclusions with regard to Professor Gormley present a mixed pattern, one in which, however, a duly constituted governance committee investigated and deliberated at length before finally making a recommendation which was affirmed by the administration. Neither the General Counsel nor the Charging Party argues that the committee acted without a quorum. Those two faculty members who were away, by choice, were polled after the last round of interviews and were present for the earlier investigation. That Professor Stecher and perhaps the others in the majority were opponents of union organization cannot be, should not be, and has not been raised as a basis for impunging the integrity of the work of the committee. While one may disagree with its conclusions, denying a hearing to Gormley, what is persuasive here is that the committee spent considerable time, even additional time and effort at the urging of its dissenting member, in investigating and deliberating to an effective governance committee decision. On the other hand, President White frustrated majority faculty sentiment when he refused to acknowledge the legitimacy of the procedures for selecting an ad hoc committee to hear the Gormley complaints. In this instance, the governance system was unable to achieve faculty compliance with the results of its workings. Faculty efforts, taken outside the governances, proved ineffective and faculty disillusion resulted. Given the context of union tensions in which the case arose, perhaps such a result was inevitable. The failure of the joint faculty attempt to censure the president resulted from faculty failure to maintain a quorum at the meeting involved, but, in any event, should not be viewed as determinative of lack of faculty effectiveness in matters of academic freedom and breaches of procedural safeguards on tenure and other personnel matters in light of the total history of the workings of the committee, the grievance experiences under the contract, and the reinstitution of the committee in its basic pre-1978 form, but with a slightly different faculty composition and now fully recognizing humanities faculty participation.

On matters outside the strictly academic, faculty influence has been somewhat weaker. One area, in which more recent history has shown strong faculty participation, in fact joint determination, relates to the structure, location, and leadership of the humanities faculty. The facts of the administration's determinations from 1969 to 1979 regarding the institution's structure and placement and governance participation of the humanities faculty with only limited overall faculty participation has been amply documented. The final report issued in 1978 of the accreditation team from the Middle States Association makes clear the adverse effect that the many unilateral changes in academic organization had, in particular, on the morale of the faculty of Liberal Arts and Sciences. Subsequent to the entry into the collective-bargaining relationship, the unit of full-time faculty achieved a form of parity in determining this subject matter. The off-the-record meetings and negotiations between the union president and the provost led to agreements in principle and in detail on the form of the 1979 restructuring of the humanities faculty and the status, identity, and benefits of the head of that restructured division.

Amicus, New York City Central Labor Council, AFL–CIO, argues eloquently in its posthearing brief that the Act should not permit employees in a unit to lose their status because of the success of the negotiations of their bargaining representative on nonmandatory subjects of bargaining. That brief was filed before the Board's decision issued in College of Osteopathic Medicine, 265 NLRB 295 (1982), which I find determinative on this issue. There, the Board rejected a union contention that a unit should not be able to "bargain itself out of the protections of the Act." It concluded that inasmuch as "[t]he Yeshiva decision does not expressly or impliedly distinguish situations in which managerial authority was gained through collective bargaining from situations in which such authority was granted, and we do not believe that such a distinction is required by the Act . . . we must look to the extent of managerial authority held by college faculties rather than the manner in which such authority was obtained." Id. at 298.

I conclude that with respect to the 1979 reorganization, the faculty, through its chief representative of the Union in the bargaining unit, jointly exercised managerial authority with the provost, even to the extent of cooperating on expediting its approval by the faculty-student Senate under the governances. As an independent, but related, conclusion, it is undisputed that since the 1979 reorganization, the humanities faculty, in whichever school they are situated, have had all governance rights and responsibilities fully restored to them. It is also apparent that the union-administration review of the governances undertaken in 1978 after execution of the collective-bargaining agreement, leading to agreement on certain changes and modifications including the exclusion of certain provisions covered as terms and conditions of employment in the agreement, involved the faculty members of the bargaining unit in an important aspect of managerial decision making.

The president's failure to call the joint faculty into session for a lengthy time following its attempt to censure him surely disminished the faculty's status during that period, although most other governance committees continued to function normally. That situation changed with the appointment of new President Lacy and has not recurred since 1980. The Senate's consideration of the incident involving administration responsibility for the destruction of a student's politically inspired artwork in 1980–1981 evidences an active Senate making an effective contribution to the governance system in which its recommendations were followed at least to the extent of the chief executive officers expressing regret over the incident and paying the student's expenses. The conclusion is also warranted that the very fact that the Senate took testimony and deliberated on the matter shows that faculty authority extended to a matter of student academic freedom not otherwise covered by the governances and probably acted as a deterrence to similar breaches of such freedom by the administration or its nonunit supervisory employees in the future.

The reason for the inactiveness of the AF&T committee following the Gormley affair is unclear but probably this committee would have continued to serve in protecting faculty procedural and academic freedom concerns had a faculty member claimed a breach of such rights during the period 1975 to 1978. There is no evidence that any faculty member did so.

The Senate's decision to discontinue meetings following the mid-1970s institutional reorganization, while understandable because of faculty frustration with its limited input into basic policy decisions which were governed by economic considerations, represented a voluntary self-limitation on the exercise of its advisory role in many areas of policymaking for a 3-year period, and caused the administration, noted at meetings of the dean's council, to determine certain matters otherwise normally within the Senate's authority under the governances.

With respect to building and real estate matters, fixing budgets and allocation of funds, and faculty compensation and benefits (except for the 1978–1980 contract period), the faculty has had either a nonexistent or extremely limited participation in decision making. As to the library consortium affecting delivery of library service at Cooper Union, unsuccessful faculty opposition to the plan is plain from the record. On hiring, reappointment, and tenure of full-time faculty, faculty consultation is required by the governances, is sought, and in practice is regularly weighed and considered, although its input has not been very effective even during periods of time when other administration policy considerations have not predominated. Faculty input on adjunct initial hiring has been even less effective, although its effective recommendations on reappointment and, by virtue of its monitoring of elective course offerings, its consistent input into the process of adjunct course assignments are borne out by the record. The faculty's advisory role in the appointment of administrators is also fairly limited.

The foregoing review of this voluminous record has not been exhaustive but has, I believe, pinpointed those areas of academic and nonacademic decision making where faculty participation has or has not risen to a level of effectiveness where its contributions could be said under the Yeshiva standard to constitute or not constitute an exercise of managerial authority.

Although the Board has had the opportunity since Yeshiva to interpret and apply the Supreme Court's standard to a number of college and university faculties, I can find no reported decision which presents a similar fact pattern to the one disclosed in this case. None of the reported decisions have shown such a limited faculty effectiveness in nonacademic areas even while exhibiting predominant faculty finality on decisions in a broad range of academic areas.

In Lewis University, 265 NLRB 1239 (1982), the faculty exercised little actual authority with respect to many academic areas, and its role was effectively limited by the terms of both a master contract and a faculty handbook. Here, the faculty exercise considerable academic authority which is reaffirmed in both the governance provisions and the collective-bargaining agreement while in effect. The management-rights clause in the 1978 contract is considerably narrower than that executed by the Lewis University faculty. In Florida Memorial College, 263 NLRB 1248 (1982), unlike in this case, no faculty were tenured, a layer of intermediate administrators was employed between faculty and higher administration, and there was no effective faculty input into the catalog, standards for retention of student status, or teaching loads.

In College of Osteopathic Medicine, supra, in which the Board found the faculty to be managerial, among other factors it weighed were the faculty's considerable influence on hiring of its members and effectively recommending their initial rank and subsequent promotions, and administration reliance on tenure committee recommendations—areas of important nonacademic matters where Cooper Union faculty have more limited input. In Loretto Heights College, 264 NLRB 1107 (1982), unlike the situation at Cooper Union, in no area was faculty authority absolute and there was an administrative staff of program directors and coordinators who acted as a buffer between faculty and higher administration. In Puerto Rico Junior College, 265 NLRB 72 (1982), unlike the governance committee structure at Cooper Union, the faculty were in the majority on only one committee in a hierarchy of governing committees.

In Ithaca College, 261 NLRB 577 (1982), the faculty enjoyed considerable authority in both academic and nonacademic areas, and in Bradford College, 261 NLRB 565 (1982), faculty recommendations in a broad range of academic areas were ignored. While the Board also specifically referred to and weighed an accreditation report in deciding that the faculty did not enjoy managerial authority, I do not deem the 1978 Middle States Association accreditation report discussed on this record to have similar weight, since it did not conclude that faculty lacked participation in academic decision making, which they had, but rather stressed that faculty participation in academic organization and, in particular, humanities faculty participation in faculty governance was lacking—both of which were changed so that by 1979 the Cooper Union faculty jointly participated in the last reorganization and humanities faculty have since enjoyed full governance status.

In Thiel College, 261 NLRB 580 (1982), where faculty enjoyed similar status under its constitution, at least as to academic affairs, as Cooper Union faculty enjoy under its governances, that faculty, unlike the Cooper Union faculty, also enjoyed considerable authority over budgetary matters, salary issues and their grievance adjustment, and in the areas of hiring, tenure, sabbaticals, terminations, and promotions. In Duquesne University, 261 NLRB 587 (1982), unlike the situation at Cooper Union, the faculty had veto power over any hiring decision made by the dean.

In spite of the foregoing factual distinctions in each of the Board decisions in this area, some common principles may be gleaned from them. In Thiel College, supra, the Board noted that lack of faculty involvement in certain nonacademic areas was not "vitally significant" in determining managerial status. These matters included tuition, enrollment levels, and the continuance and location of the program at the college's overseas Bregenz school. Furthermore, the Board minimized the importance of administration changes in faculty prepared budgets where the changes were made due to intermittent institutional financial problems. In Duquesne University, supra, the Board concluded that while several faculty members received notices of termination in spite of faculty votes to the contrary and the dean was reinstated for a second 5-year term despite a negative faculty vote, the lack of authority in this area, less than that exercised by the Yeshiva faculty, was not determinative given the similar authority exercised in other areas previously outlined, including both academic and nonacademic. In Duquesne, the Board also took pains to comment favorably on the fact that the school's bylaws, just as does the faculty governances on this record, provide that faculty members shall enjoy full academic freedom in the classroom.

It is also significant that the Supreme Court in Yeshiva gave paramount importance to the faculty's role in academic matters, "effectively decid[ing] which students will be admitted, retained, and graduated," ahead of its role in certain nonacademic areas, in determining its managerial authority in conducting the central "business" of the university. I am also influenced by the limited number of administrators employed by Cooper Union, whose total number involved in faculty governance, 8, contrary to Charging Party's claim, is not large compared to the number of faculty, over 50, and this factor was deemed significant in at least three of the Board decisions reviewed above. It is also significant that only four administrators, the three deans and one chairperson, stand between the faculty and the president and provost in academic decision making under the governances.

While the issue is not entirely free from doubt, I conclude that based on the Cooper Union faculty's predominance and considerable authority in such academic areas as student admissions and class size, academic standards and retention, grading standards, requirements and system, curriculum, calendar, standards and fixing of class and examination schedules, and the protection of academic freedom in the classroom and in the school and due process in the determinations of tenure, promotion, and terminations relating to other than the elimination of entire academic programs, its authority in jointly determining and implementing the most recent academic reorganization placement of humanities faculty and identity and status of its chairperson, and its considerable consultative role in other nonacademic areas of faculty concern, such as tenure, promotion, and hiring of full-time faculty, among other areas, the full-time faculty employed by Cooper Union exercise managerial authority in sufficient areas deemed significant or "vital" by the Supreme Court and the Board so as to share the real responsibility for governance of the institution and to constitute managerial employees within the meaning of the Act. Accordingly, I conclude that the allegations of the complaint have not been sustained.

Having reached this decision, I deem it unnecessary to determine the supervisory status of the librarians or faculty, although if required to determine these issues I would find the assistant librarians to be nonsupervisory, since they supervise nonunit student employees for only a small fraction of their time, Adelphi University, 195 NLRB 639, 643–645 (1972), they do not supervise other library employees, and the record fails to establish that faculty members supervise laboratory technicians, shop assistants, or any other employees within the meaning of Section 2(12) of the Act. Furthermore, while the unit sought includes assistant librarians who do not exercise managerial authority, I also conclude that, just as in Yeshiva, it is far too broad to permit the three library employees included to constitute a separate unit appropriate for bargaining under the Act. For the same reason I also conclude now that the Charging Party, where membership is limited to Cooper Union staff, is not a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. The three library assistants constitute a group of statutory employees whose number is de minimus with respect to the overall unit.

International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union No. 482, AFL–CIO and Norment Glass Company, a Division of Norment Industries, Inc. and Glaziers, Architectural Metal & Glass Workers Local Union No. 1778, AFL–CIO. Case 23–CD–442

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed 23 August 1984[1] by the Employer, alleging that the Respondent, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union No. 482, AFL–CIO (the Iron Workers) violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Glaziers, Architectural Metal & Glass Workers Local Union No. 1778, AFL–CIO (the Glaziers). The hearing was held 20 and 21 September before Hearing Officer Javier R. Gonzalez.

The National Labor Relations Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, an Alabama corporation, is engaged in subcontracting for glazing, curtain wall, and window systems work. During the 12 months preceding the hearing the Employer purchased and shipped goods and materials to its Austin, Texas job valued in excess of $50,000 directly from outside the State of Texas. The Employer has gross revenues in excess of $500,000. The parties stipulate, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and the Iron Workers and the Glaziers are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

On 25 March 1983 general contractor Warrior Constructors, Inc. (Warrior) subcontracted with the Employer for entrance and window work at William B. Travis State Office Building (Travis Building) in Austin, Texas. In September 1983 Iron Workers Business Manager D. A. Ragsdale telephoned an employer representative in Montgomery, Alabama, to request the assignment of metal installation work on this project to Iron Workers-represented employees.

In July, however, Norment assigned the work to employees represented by the Glaziers. The Iron Workers protested, and Iron Workers, Glaziers, Employer, and Warrior representatives held several meetings attempting to resolve the dispute. They did not reach agreement. During a 24 July meeting Ragsdale claimed the disputed work on behalf of employees represented by the Iron Workers and told the Employer's vice president and general manager Pat Johnson that the Glaziers would do the work "over his dead body." The Iron Workers began picketing at the jobsite's main gate on 21 August, carrying signs reading, "Norment Industries has no agreement with the Iron Workers No. 482." After about 3 days the picketers moved to the Employer's reserved gate. They picketed until 28 August. Numerous employees at the jobsite ceased work.

B. Work in Dispute

The parties stipulated and we find that the disputed work involves the installation of all aluminum entrances exceeding 125 square feet or 13 feet high or wide, metal work in storefront fixed show or display window units and entrance doors, installation of aluminum windows, bronze handrails, and metal supports for glass handrails, and caulking associated with this work, including all aluminum and steel support angles and clips, flashing and trim at the William B. Travis State Office Building in Austin, Texas.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends here is reasonable cause to believe the Iron Workers violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act based on Ragsdale's 24 July claim and threat followed by the jobsite picketing and work cessation. It further asserts that the Board should award the disputed work to employees represented by the Glaziers based on its collective-bargaining agreement with the Glaziers, its preference and past practice, and economy and efficiency of operations. The Employer also asserts that no area or industry practice precludes an award to Glaziers-represented employees, and that they possess superior skills for performing the disputed work.

The Iron Workers contends the Board should award the work to employees it represents based on a 1961 interunion agreement with the Glaziers providing that this type of work be assigned to its members. The Iron Workers further asserts that the Employer's past practice, economy and efficiency of operations, and relative skills favor such an award.

D. Applicability of the Statute

The Iron Workers does not dispute that Ragsdale told the Employer's vice president and general manager Johnson that Glaziers-represented employees would do the disputed work "over his dead body," that the Iron Workers picketed at the jobsite from 21 August to 28 August, or that numerous employees at the jobsite refused to cross the picket line.

Under these circumstances we find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred. No party contends that there is an agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

No party contends that the Board has certified either of the Unions involved in this dispute as the collective-bargaining representative for a unit of the Employer's employees.

The Employer is a party to the Glaziers International's national agreement, and contends several of the agreement's provisions cover the disputed work. We disagree. Article II, section 2 of this agreement describes work comparable to the disputed work, but pertains only to the installation of equipment and protective devices at detention facilities.[2] Article II, section 3 covers installation of electronic equipment that is not comparable to the disputed work.[3]

The Employer has no collective-bargaining agreement with either Local involved in this dispute.

The Employer maintains a permanent crew of employees represented by Glaziers Local 432 at its home office in Montgomery, Alabama, and is party to a collective-bargaining agreement with that local. The Employer claims that, because all the permanent employees working on the Travis Building project are Local 432 members, the agreement requires it to assign the disputed work to Glaziers-represented employees. We find this unpersuasive, however, as Glaziers Local 1778, the only Glaziers local claiming the disputed work, is not a party to that agreement.

Accordingly, this factor does not support an assignment of work to employees represented by either Union.

2. Company preference and past practice

During the past 32 years the Employer has consistently assigned metal installation work similar to the disputed work to employees represented by various Glaziers locals. As noted, the Employer maintains a permanent crew of Glaziers Local 432 members in Montgomery, Alabama. Johnson testified that the Employer typically dispatches Local 432 members from Montgomery to its jobsites and supplements that crew with employees represented by the area Glaziers local. At the Travis Building, the Employer employs a core group of Glaziers

[2] It states as follows:
Section 2. Work covered by this Agreement shall include all work in the installation of detention equipment necessary to contain inmates or patients within a facility and the installation of necessary protective devices to make safe any facility from attempted penetration by force from without, including, but not necessarily limited thereto; such as, the installation of architectural metal, glass, exterior and interior panels, storefront metal and glass, curtain wall erection, ornamental and custom metals; such as doors, rails, enclosures, installation of ballistic frames, ballistic and security glass, ballistic steel panels, hollow metal security doors, security windows, security locks, hardware and devices, electrically operated consoles, security pass-thru devices, security grill work, fixtures and furniture in accordance with the installation specifications of the manufacturer, Architect, owner or builder including all incidental work required for the installation; such as, welding, electrical work, carpentry work and mechanical work, the unloading, stockpiling and distribution of all material, the operation, use and care of all tools and equipment required to perform the above described work.

[3] It states as follows:
Section 3. Work covered by this Agreement also includes all work in the installation and repair of electronic or pneumatic controlling, signaling, reporting, sound, communications and audio-visual/television in or on any type of facility or location; including but not limited to multi-plex systems, computers, facilities/energy management systems, control panels, access controls, perimeter/interior detection, fire alarm, intercommunications, sound, nurse call, television systems, audio-visual systems, electronic racks and cabinets, pneumatic tubing and controls, as well as installation of wire, cable and tubing in accordance with the installation specifications of the manufacturer, architect, owner or builder including all incidental work required for the installation; such as welding, electrical work, carpentry work and mechanical work; the unloading, stockpiling and distribution of all material; the operation, use and care of all tools and equipment required to perform the above described work.

Local 432 members, supplemented by a crew of employees represented by Glaziers Local 1778. The Employer has used employees represented by an Iron Workers local on only two occasions, in Midland, Texas, where there is no Glaziers local.

Johnson testified that the Employer prefers to use Glaziers-represented employees to perform the work in dispute.

We therefore find that the factor of company preference and past practice favors an award to employees represented by the Glaziers.

3. Area and industry practice

Employees represented by the Glaziers perform work similar to that in dispute in the Austin area and other locations throughout the country. Jim Reed, the Glaziers business representative, admitted, however, that employees represented by the Iron Workers also worked on similar projects at numerous locations in the Austin area. Reed further testified that "there is no real clear cut way of [work] assignment in Austin," because some companies assign work exclusively to employees represented by the Glaziers, while others assign it to employees represented by the Iron Workers or to composite crews of employees represented by both Unions. Ragsdale estimated that in the Austin area Glaziers-represented employees perform 30–70 percent of this work similar to the Travis Building project, while Reed testified to a figure of 75–80 percent. Thus, it appears there is no consistent area or industry practice for assignment of this type of work.

Accordingly, this factor does not favor an assignment of work to employees represented by either Union.

4. Relative skills

The Glaziers apprenticeship program provides instruction for the various metal fabrication and installation skills required to perform the disputed work[4] and, as noted, Glaziers-represented employees have performed similar work for this and other employers.

Employees represented by the Iron Workers have also performed metal installation work for various employers. Johnson testified that employees represented by both the Glaziers and the Iron Workers were "quality people" who did "quality work" on previous jobs.

[4] Reed is the training program's director. He testified that the curriculum covers "all phases of glazing" and includes training in erection and fabrication of all types of metal, welding, shop drawings, blueprints, caulking, sealants, tubular metals of all types, curtain walls, glass handling, fabrication, and installation.

We therefore find that this factor does not favor an award to employees represented by either Union.

5. Economy and efficiency of operations

The disputed work essentially involves installing metal frames on the Travis Building; Glaziers-represented employees insert glass into the metal frames. The Employer claims it is more efficient to employ only employees represented by the Glaziers to perform all of this work. Reed and Johnson testified that using the same people to install the frames and to insert the glass would eliminate the work problems such as delay, inefficiency, and conflicts created by having a composite crew. Reed cited an instance involving another glass company, in which Glaziers-represented employees had to redo faulty installation by the Iron Workers-represented employees and stated that such problems occur quite often. In rebuttal, however, Ragsdale testified that the problems noted by Reed would normally be brought to his attention and that he has received no such complaints on any project, including the project Reed referred to.

Johnson further testified that using a composite crew would require the Employer to use additional employees to train and supervise the Iron Workers-represented employees. Johnson admitted, however, that if the Employer had assigned the disputed work to a composite crew initially it would not have needed any additional employees.

The Employer claims that awarding the work solely to Glaziers-represented employees would save it money because the Glaziers-represented employees receive substantially lower wages than the Iron Workers-represented employees.

We do not regard differences in wage rates as a factor, however. Cuyahoga Carpenters District Council (Midwest Exhibitors), 217 NLRB 190, 193 (1975).

We therefore find that this factor does not favor an award to employees represented by either Union.

6. Interunion agreement

On 22 February 1961 the Glaziers International entered into a national agreement with the Iron Workers International covering, inter alia, jurisdictional work assignments. It is undisputed that the national agreement, referred to by the parties as the "blue book," awarded work such as that in dispute to Iron Workers-represented employees. The Glaziers International, however, abrogated this agreement in 1974.

The Iron Workers argues that the abrogation was not effective in Texas because in March 1974

Iron Workers and Glaziers local representatives from Houston, Fort Worth, Dallas, and Austin reached an agreement with another Texas glass company to assign work in accordance with the "blue book" agreement. The Employer, however, was a not a party to this agreement. Additionally, Reed stated that Ragsdale was the first person to cite the "blue book" to him in 10 years. Reed testified that he had advised Ragsdale on a "number of occasions," including during discussions concerning the Travis Building project, that the Glaziers considered the 1961 agreement to be abrogated, and Johnson testified he understood the Employer may assign work to employees represented by either Union.

We therefore find this factor does not favor an award of work to employees represented by either Union.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that Glaziers-represented employees are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the factor of company preference and past practice. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by the Glaziers, not to that Union or its members.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Norment Glass Company, A Division of Norment Industries, Inc., represented by Glaziers, Architectural Metal & Glass Workers Union No. 1778, AFL–CIO are entitled to perform the work of installing all aluminum entrances, exceeding 125 square feet or 13 feet high or wide, metal work in storefront fixed show or display window units and entrance doors, installation of aluminum windows, bronze handrails, and metal supports for glass handrails and caulking associated with this work, including all aluminum and steel support angles and clips, flashing and trim at the William B. Travis State Office Building jobsite in Austin, Texas.

2. International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union No. 482, AFL–CIO is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Norment Glass Company to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union No. 482, AFL-CIO shall notify the Regional Director for Region 23 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 31 July 1984 Administrative Law Judge Richard L. Denison issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs. The Respondent filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed, subject to the limitations provided for in the Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD L. DENISON, Administrative Law Judge. This consolidated proceeding was heard in Chicago, Illinois, on January 19, 20, and 21, and April 12, 13, 14, 15, 1983, at which time a full record was completed.[1] The consolidated complaint, as amended, alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by issuing two disciplinary warning notices to Charlie Jones, refusing to pay Jones holiday pay for Memorial Day 1982 and suspending him for 3 days, and discharging Jones on June 29, 1982. Also alleged as violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) are the discharges of seven other employees, who the General Counsel contends were terminated because of their union sympathies and activities, and who Respondent maintains were released for engaging in a work stoppage, or "wild cat" strike, in violation of plant rule 12 and the no-strike clause of its collective-bargaining agreement with Plastic Workers' Union Local No. 18, AFL–CIO. The Respondent's answer, as amended, denies the allegations of unfair labor practices alleged in the amended consolidated complaint. The answer also specifically asserts that these cases should be deferred to arbitration under the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement then in effect.

Based on the entire record in the case,[2] including my consideration of the briefs filed June 20, 1983, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Based on the allegations of paragraphs II(a), II(b), and II(c) of the complaint, as amended, admitted in paragraph II of the Respondent's answer, as amended, I find that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

Based on the allegations of paragraph III of the complaint, as amended, admitted in paragraph III of Respondent's answer, as amended, and other undisputed evidence in the record, I find that United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE), the Charging Party, and Plastic Workers Union Local 18, AFL–CIO are each labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Respondent operates a custom injection plastic molding plant at Franklin Park, Illinois. As of early 1981, Respondent's production and janitorial employees had been represented for 17 years by Plastic Workers' Union Local 18, AFL–CIO with whom the Respondent had had a series of 3-year contracts. The most recent agreement, in evidence, expired in July 1982, pursuant to a memorandum of agreement between the Company and Local 18 extending the duration of the contract until the question concerning the Charging Party's representation status was resolved. The General Counsel does not attack the validity of that extension. Moreover, it is conceded that the contract with Local 18 was in full force and effect at the time of the incidents on which the allegations of the complaint, as amended, were based.

Approximately June 1981, through certain of Respondent's employees, the Charging Party began securing signed authorization cards from Respondent's workers as part of a drive to replace Local 18 as bargaining agent. An election petition was filed with the Board by the Charging Party on August 4, 1981, and, pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, an election was held on October 2, 1981. The Charging Party won and, following the resolution of objections to the election, the UE was certified by the Board and the Respondent's contractual relationship with Local 18 ended. Initially, the Respondent sought to test the validity of the certification by refusing to bargain with the Charging Party. A charge in Case 13–CA–22375 was filed as the result of this adopted course of action and processed through the Board's summary judgment procedure, wherein the General Counsel obtained a bargaining order which the Board issued in T.L.B. Plastics Corp., 266 NLRB 331, on March 7, 1983, in the midst of a recess in this proceeding. Upon resumption of this hearing on April 12, 1983, the Respondent, through its counsel, gave notice on the record that it intended to comply with the Board's Order and, accordingly, would recognize and bargain with the Charging Party.[3] Thereafter negotiations took place, and the Respondent and the UE executed a collective-bargaining agreement on January 29, 1984, effective from January 30, 1984, until December 31, 1986.

[1] During the course of the hearing Cases 13–CA–22571 and 13–CA–22632 were severed, settled, and withdrawn.

[2] (a) Certain errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

(b) Respondent's motion to strike portions of the General Counsel's brief to the judge, "Attachment B" [omitted from publication] to this decision, is granted. As requested in par. 3 of that motion, official notice is taken of the Board's decision in T.L.B. Plastics Corp., 266 NLRB 331 (1983). Official notice is not taken of the record in the underlying representation proceeding. The General Counsel's response to Respondent's motion to strike is included as "Attachment C" for purposes of clarity.

Notwithstanding the sequence of events recited above, at the time of the closing of this record the Respondent adhered to its affirmative defense that the issues which comprise the instant proceeding should be deferred to arbitration. Thereafter, on January 19, 1984, the Board issued decisions in United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984), and Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), reestablishing deferral to arbitration as official Board policy in appropriate cases, including those involving alleged violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. In this respect United Technologies, wherein the Board overruled General American Transportation Corp., 228 NLRB 808 (1977), and renewed the application of principles enunciated in Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971), to 8(a)(3) and (1) cases, is particularly relevant. Accordingly, the judge issued an order for the parties to show cause whether or not the instant proceeding should be deferred to arbitration. Responses, which were received from all parties, have been carefully considered.

In its response the Respondent adheres to its position in its answer, which it has consistently maintained throughout this proceeding, that this matter is appropriate for deferral. The Respondent shows that at the time of the events in question the affected employees were covered by a collective-bargaining agreement with the P.W.U., which contains, as article VIII, a grievance procedure culminating in final and binding arbitration. Timely grievances were filed by each of the alleged discriminatees in the instant proceeding with respect to the same issues which are the subject of this proceeding.[4] There is no issue of a defense of the timeliness limitations of the agreement, since both the Respondent and the P.W.U. have agreed to arbitrate the merits of this dispute based on the full record in the instant Board proceeding. Consideration of the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint is thus assured. The arbitrator has been designated in accordance with the governing contractual provision. The P.W.U. has again reaffirmed its willingness to honor its residual commitment under its former contract with Respondent.[5]

[3] At which time the charge in Case 13–CA–22632, another 8(a)(5) charge, was withdrawn.

[4] Attachment E [omitted from publication].

[5] Attachment F [omitted from publication].

The General Counsel concedes that the issues raised in the unfair labor practice proceeding fall within the scope of the expired collective-bargaining agreement. However, the General Counsel argues that arbitration of this matter under the terms of that agreement under these circumstances would operate in derogation of the Charging Party's representative status, undermining that status and operating in derogation of the current agreement between the Charging Party and the Respondent. The General Counsel also argues that the Charging Party is not bound by the terms of the P.W.U. contract, and has replaced the P.W.U. as majority representative and, in addition, that the competition between the Charging Party and the P.W.U. during the election campaign created opposing interests which render this dispute unsuited to resolution by the arbitral process. Finally, it is contended that submission to arbitration would result in delay. The Charging Party's position, vigorously expressed in its brief, closely parallels that of the General Counsel.

In disagreement with the General Counsel and the Charging Party, in my view, the concerns they express do not preclude deferral to arbitration in the somewhat unusual circumstances of this particular case. As noted by the Respondent the issues raised by the consolidated complaint in a statutory context are also contractual issues under the no-strike, management rights, and holiday pay provisions of the P.W.U. contract then in effect. The facts which must be considered are also the same. Likewise, the issue of discrimination because of union activity, based on these same facts, will be passed upon by the arbitrator by virtue of the prohibition against union discrimination specified in article VII of that agreement. Thus, the requirement that the contractual issues and the unfair labor practice issues be factually parallel, is met. Secondly, the General Counsel's and Charging Party's objections that the Charging Party's interests would not be protected, and that due process and a fair hearing would be denied ignores the realities of the existing circumstances. It would appear that the employees involved continued to have a substantial amount of faith in the fairness of the grievance-arbitration machinery of the existing contract between Respondent and P.W.U., despite their support of the Charging Party in the representation case, otherwise they would not have pursued that avenue of relief, a course of action which they have never abandoned. Furthermore, there is undisputed evidence in the record showing that P.W.U. Union Steward Flora Rambo, on whose testimony the General Counsel relies, made considerable efforts to perform her contractual duties with respect to representing the alleged discriminatees, including extensive efforts seeking to persuade the employees who left their work stations to return to work for fear that they might lose their jobs for violating the no-strike clause of the P.W.U. contract. Such evidence, coupled with P.W.U.'s reaffirmation of its commitment to arbitrate these cases, tends to refute any contention that the alleged discriminatees would not receive fair representation before the arbitrator. Likewise, the Charging Party's interests have been protected since the basis for the arbitration of these issues will be the full record in the instant proceeding in which the Charging Party freely participated and filed a brief. The fact that the Charging Party chose to represent itself at the hearing through the services of the field organizer responsible for the Charging Party's organizational drive rather than an attorney (the only appearance entered for the Charging Party in this case) is no impediment, since representation by a lay person is a common occurrence in Board proceedings. Finally, contrary to the expressed concern of the General Counsel and the Charging Party, arbitration of this matter is more likely to avoid rather then increase any further delay in resolving the issues specified in the consolidated complaint.

In sum, the true situation presented here is simply this. There remains one final item of unfinished business remaining under Respondent's contract with P.W.U.—the disposition of the final grievances filed under that contract by the affected employees who decided to use that avenue in seeking relief. Because of this case, these grievances have been held in abeyance at the arbitration stage. In my view, excluding tradition, emotion, and tactical considerations, invalid reasons for not processing these matters in an arbitral forum, there is really no logical reason why these issues cannot be determined by an arbitrator. The interests of the Charging Party have been sufficiently safeguarded, as described above. Furthermore, as the Board stated in United Technologies, supra at 560:

> Contrary to the notion of the majority in General American Transportation, deferral is not akin to abdication. It is merely the prudent exercise of restraint, a postponement of the use of the Board's processes to give the parties' own dispute resolution machinery a chance to succeed. The Board's processes may always be invoked if the arbitral result is inconsistent with the standards of Spielberg. [Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955).]

Accordingly, I find and conclude that the issues raised by the consolidated complaint in Cases 13–CA–22322 and 13–CA–22353 should be deferred to the grievance-arbitration provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and Plastic Workers Union Local No. 18, AFL–CIO, under the principles of Dubo Mfg. Corp., 142 NLRB 431 (1963); and of Collyer, supra; and National Radio, supra.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. T.L.B. Plastics Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE) and Plastic Workers Union Local No. 18, AFL–CIO are each labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Good cause has been shown that the issues raised by the consolidated complaint should be deferred to the grievance-arbitration provisions of the applicable collective-bargaining agreement under the principles of Dubo Mfg. Corp., supra, Collyer, supra, and National Radio, supra.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed, provided that:

Jurisdiction of this proceeding is retained for the limited purpose of entertaining an appropriate and timely motion for further consideration upon a proper showing that either (a) the dispute has not, with reasonable promptness after the issuance of this Decision and Order, either been resolved by amicable settlement in the grievance procedure or submitted promptly to arbitration, or (b) the grievance or arbitration procedures have not been fair and regular or have reached a result which is repugnant to the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 28 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Joan Wieder issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] Chairman Dotson and Member Dennis agree with the judge's dismissal of the 8(b)(1)(A) allegations pertaining to the 1 July 1983 incident at the hiring hall. In doing so, however, they find that Williams was not engaged in protected concerted activity when he became involved in an altercation with the office manager following his discovery of the inadvertent omission of his name from an unofficial work dispatch list. They also find in these circumstances that Shain's failure to restrain Williams did not constitute a refusal to interfere with the protected activity of another. Accordingly, they find that further credibility resolutions are unnecessary and that the Union did not violate Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) when it fined and disciplined Williams and Shain following this incident.

Member Hunter finds merit to the General Counsel's exception that the judge's finding that Williams threatened Harer is not presently supported by the credited testimony and that the judge further erred in finding testimony regarding the 1 July 1983 incident in the hiring hall "undisputed" while failing to resolve clear inconsistencies in testimony as noted in her earlier factual findings. Accordingly, he would remand this portion of the decision to the judge for appropriate credibility resolutions.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOAN WIEDER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 15 and 16 February 1984 in Bakersfield, California, on the General Counsel's complaint, as amended, which alleges that the Respondent labor organization, General Teamsters and Food Processing Local 87, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Union or Respondent) engaged in violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Specifically, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by refusing to allow Don W. Williams, James Carpenter, and Wendell Bell to register for employment and by failing and refusing to refer them for employment. Respondent answers that these individuals are owner-operators and, as such, have been previously ruled to be independent contractors, citing, among others, General Contractors v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 271 (9th Cir. 1977); Teamsters Local 36 (California Dump Truck Owners), 249 NLRB 386 (1980), affd. 669 F.2d 759 (D.C. Cir. 1981); Associated Independent Operators v. NLRB, 407 F.2d 1383 (9th Cir. 1969); Teamsters Joint Council No. 42 v. NLRB, 671 F.2d 305 (9th Cir. 1981); Teamsters Joint Council No. 42 v. Associated General Contractors of California, 520 F.Supp. 3 (1981), affd. per curiam 662 F.2d 531 (9th Cir. 1981), cert. denied 109 LRRM 3016 (1982).

The General Counsel also asserts that the Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by bringing charges against, assessing fines on, and disciplining Don H. Williams and Harry Shain. Respondent generally denies committing any violations, asserting that Williams is not protected since he is an independent contractor; the Union's actions were solely matters related to the acquisition and retention of membership, not their employment status; and Shain was not engaged in protected concerted activity.

On the record as a whole, including my observation of the witnesses, briefs, and arguments of counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. BACKGROUND

The Union[1] has been involved in a series of legal proceedings involving owner-operators of dump trucks and grading and excavating equipment wherein it was found by two circuit courts of appeals that these owner-operators are independent contractors, not employees. The instant proceeding involves owner-operators of water trucks. Historically the Union has taken the position that the owner-operators who hire out to contractors engaged in construction are employees.

A partial precis of these decisions and the Union's reaction thereto follows: In Associated Independent Owner-Operators v. NLRB, supra, owner-operators of grading and excavating equipment working on the jobsite, digging trenches, etc., were found to be independent contractors, reversing the Board's decision.

In J. K. Baker Trucking Co., 181 NLRB 515 (1970), the Board found owner-operators of dump trucks working at construction sites in southern California to be employees. This decision was affirmed in Teamsters Joint Council No. 42 v. NLRB, 450 F.2d 1322 (D.C. Cir. 1971). In response to this decision, the Union modified its master labor agreement covering the heavy construction industry in southern California to clearly treat owner-operators as employees.[2]

[1] It is undisputed that the companies and associations contracting with the Union are employers engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that the Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

In 1971, certain of the owner-operators covered by the master labor agreement filed a decertification petition. The Board found the petitioners to be employees. Associated General Contractors of California, 201 NLRB 311 (1973).

In Associated General Contractors of California v. NLRB, supra (564 F.2d 271), the court reversed a Board decision involving an alleged violation of Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act and found that the owner-operators of dump trucks were independent contractors. The Board, on remand, dismissed the complaint and the decertification petition filed in Associated General Contractors of California, supra, accepting the circuit court's decision as the law of the case, 239 NLRB 686.

The Union did not modify its agreement and continued to treat owner-operators as employees. The General Counsel issued a complaint alleging Respondent was violating Section 8(e) and Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(A) of the Act by including these owner-operators in the agreement since they are independent contractors, under the law of the case in Associated General Contractors of California, id. The Board held that the issue of whether the owner-operators were independent contractors, in Teamsters Joint Council No. 42 (Irvine-Sante Fe Co.), 248 NLRB 808 (1980), was res judicata, affd. 671 F.2d 305 (9th Cir. 1981).

In Teamsters Joint Council No. 42 v. Associated General Contractors of California, 520 F.Supp. 3 (C.D. Calif. 1981), affd. per curiam 662 F.2d 531 (9th Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 1021 (1982), it was held that, subject to the provisions of Section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act, trust funds could not accept contrtibutions made on behalf of the dump truck owner-operators since they were found to be independent contractors. In the 1983–1987 master labor agreement, entitled "Owner-Operators," the provisions of the 1971–1983 agreement were modified to delete all references to owner-operators being employees and/or under the control of the contractor being placed on the payroll, receiving contract wages or maintaining union membership. Also section 2304 of the 1983–1987 master labor agreement provides that owner-operators are covered by the "owner-operator clause of the agreement" except when action in their capacity as employers when they operate under a "short-form agreement" incorporating by reference the master labor agreement. In sum, the Union determined to treat all owner-operators as independent contractors. Thus the Union precluded all owner-operators from registering with the Union as employees and being referred for employment. To do otherwise, the Union argues, would risk contempt of court proceedings and lawsuits under Section 303 of the Act.

In January 1984, the Regional Director for Region 31 issued an order consolidating cases, second amended consolidated complaint and notice of hearing asserting, in part, that water truck owner-operators are sufficiently different from dump truck and excavation equipment owner-operators to be deemed employees

II. ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF THE ACT

A. Failure to Register and Dispatch

It is undisputed that in mid-September the Union had a meeting to ratify the 1983–1987 master labor agreement which, as described above, greatly modified the section covering owner-operators. Shortly thereafter, Williams,

[2] Compare art. XIX, sec. 1903, of the 1965–1968 master labor agreement, entitled "Owner-Operator," which provides, as here pertinent:

> When a truck or piece of equipment is driven or operated by its owner as an independent contractor and is used on jobsite work covered by this agreement, the owner-driver or operator of said truck, or piece of equipment, shall receive a rate of pay not less than that specified in this Agreement. Such operator shall be, and remain, a member in good standing of the Union, and shall have a valid, current clearance from the Local Union covered by this Agreement having area jurisdiction.

with art. XIX, secs. 1900, 1901, 1902, 1917, and 1918, which provide:

OWNER-OPERATOR

1900. Owner-Operator is an individual that holds legal or registered title to a motor vehicle or to the power equipment unit thereof in his name and who personally drives such vehicle or unit in the performance of work covered by this Agreement.

1901. The Contractor expressly reserves the right to control the manner, time, means and details of, and by which the Owner-Operator performs his services, as well as the ends to be accomplished, and shall be the sole judge of the capability of the Owner-Operator's equipment to perform the work required to be performed and may if the Contractor determines that the Owner-Operator's equipment is not capable of performing the work required to be performed, terminate such Owner-Operator's services; provided, however, that the Owner-Operator may file and process a grievance under Paragraph 1919 hereof on the grounds that the Contractor's determination that the Owner-Operator's equipment is inadequate was a pretext for terminating the Owner-Operator's services. Failure to work the day or one-half (1/2) day out, as directed, shall terminate the Owner-Operator's employment and he shall be paid only for actual time worked prior to such failure. The Contractor shall not pay for time spent by the Owner-Operator in repairing, servicing, or maintaining his equipment after termination or employment or before or after his shift or half-shift, as the case may be.

1902. The Owner-Operator shall be carried on the payroll of the Contractor as an employee and as such, all the terms and conditions of this Master Agreement and any amendment or amendments thereto, shall be applicable to him except as provided elsewhere in this Article and except that in the event that it is determined that the services of an Owner-Operator were terminated without just cause, any payment for time lost shall be limited to the wage and fringe benefit payments provided in this Agreement, and shall not in any event include any payment with respect to the equipment or the loss of use thereof; and except, further, that Owner-Operator shall not be subject to the provisions of Paragraph 204, sub-paragraph 204.1 through 204.7.1.1 inclusive.

1917. It is understood by the parties that this Agreement provides for an Employer-Employee Relationship between the Contractor or Sub-contractor and each Owner-Operator of equipment used hereunder.

1918. It is recognized that many Owner-Operators have executed "short-form" agreement with the Teamsters Union which incorporate by reference provisions of this Master Labor Agreement. The provisions of such "short-form" agreement shall be applicable to said Owner-Operators only in their capacity as employers, i.e., when such Owner-Operators are employing one or more employees. When Owner-Operators are working on a job covered by this Master Labor Agreement their employment shall be covered by the Owner-Operator clause of this Agreement.

Similar provisions were included in the master labor agreement executed in 1974, 1977, and 1980.

Carpenter, and Bell were informed that they had to sign a declaration of nonownership before they could register with the Union as out of work and be dispatched. Since at least 1 October 1983, Respondent has refused to allow Bell and Carpenter to register or to refer them for employment, and Williams since about 1 December 1983,[3] the General Counsel asserts that the applicable law is the right-to-control "test of employee status" as promulgated in NLRB v. United Insurance Co. of America, 290 U.S. 254 (1968), which holds that all of the incidents of the relationships must be assessed and weighed with no one factor being decisive.

In order to find a violation, it must be determined that Williams, Carpenter, and Bell are employees. Section 2(3) of the Act specifically excludes "any individual having the status of independent contractor from its definition of 'employee.'" Only employees must be registered and dispatched by the Union.[4] This exclusion was enacted in 1947 to ensure the application of "general agency principles in distinguishing between employees and independent contractors under the Act." NLRB v. United Insurance Co. of America, 390 U.S 254, 256 (1967), citing 93 Cong.Rec. 6441–6442, 2 Leg. Hist. of the Labor Management Relations Act 1537 (1947). See H.R. Rep. No. 245, 80th Cong., lst Sess., 18, 1 Leg. Hist., 1947, p. 309; H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 510, 80th Cong., lst Sess., 32–33, 1 Leg. Hist. 536–537 (1947). See also Merchants Home Delivery Service v. NLRB, 58 F.2d 968 at 975 (9th Cir. 1978), discussing the effect of amendment to the Act on the holding in United States v. Silk, 331 U.S. 704 at 719 (1947), as follows:

> [W]here the arrangements leave the driver-owners so much responsibility for investment and management as here, they must be held to be independent contractors. These driver-owners are small businessmen. They own their own trucks. They hire their own helpers. . . . It is the total situation, including the risk undertaken, the control exercised, the opportunity for profit from sound management, that marks these driver-owners as independent contractors.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Apeals held in Merchants, supra at 976, that the economic realities discussed in the Silk case were still applicable.

The legislative history of Section 2(3) is not antipodal to this finding. House Report No. 245 on H.R. 3020 (Leg. Hist. of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, Vol. 1, p. 309) provides:

> (D) An "employee," according to all standard dictionaries, according to the law as the courts have stated it, and according to the understanding of almost everyone, with the exception of members of the National Labor Relations Boad, means someone who works for another for hire. But in the case of National Labor Relations Board v. Hearst Publications, Inc. (332 U.S. 111 (1944)), the Board expanded the definition of the term "employee" beyond anything that it ever had included before, and the Supreme Court, relying upon the theoretic "expertness" of the Board, upheld the Board. In this case the Board held independent merchants who bought newspapers from the publisher and hired people to sell them to be "employees." The people the merchants hired to sell the papers were "employees" of the merchants, but holding the merchants to be "employees" of the publisher of the papers was most far reaching. It must be presumed that when Congress passed the Labor Act, it intended words it used to have the meanings that they had when Congress passed the act, not new meanings that, 9 years later, the Labor Board might think up. In the law, there always has been a difference, and a big difference, between "employees" and "independent contractors." "Employees" work for wages and salaries under direct supervision. "Independent contractors" undertake to do a job for a price, decide how the work will be done, usually hire others to do the work, and depend for their income not upon wages, but upon the difference between what they pay for goods, materials, and labor and what they receive for the end result, that is, upon profits. It is inconceivable that Congress, when it passed the act, authorized the Board to give to every word in the act whatever meaning it wished. On the contrary, Congress intended then, and its intends now, that the Board give to words not far-fetched meanings but ordinary meanings. To correct what the Board has done, and what the Supreme Court, putting misplaced reliance upon the Board's expertness, has approved, the bill excludes "independent contractors" from the definition of "employee." [Emphasis added.]

The risk of loss, or opportunity for profit, has been a traditional consideration in determining independent contractor status.[5] The Restatement of Agency refers to [3] The alteration in the master labor agreement is not determinative of employment status. Todd v. Bernal Concrete Construction, 710 F.2d 581 (9th Cir. 1983).

[4] Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) provides:

(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—

(1) to restrain or coerce (A) employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7: Procided, That this paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or rention of membership there . . .

(2) to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection (a)(3) or to discriminate against an employee with respect to whom membership in such organization has been denied or terminated on some ground other than his failure to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.

[5] For example, Restatement 2d, Agency § 220 (1957), provides:

Definition of servant

(1) A servant is a person employed to perform services in the affairs of another and who with respect to the physical conduct in the performance of the services is subject to the other's control or right to control.

(2) In determining whether one acting for another is a servant or an independent contractor, the following matters of fact, among others, are considered:

(a) the extent of control which, by the agreement, the master may exercise over the details of the work;

Continued

"the extent of control" as only one of the elements to be considered in defining employee status. As the court held in Teamsters Local 36 v. NLRB, supra, 669 F.2d 759 at 674 (D.C. Cir. 1981):

> The Act does not define "independent contractor," but Congress intended the Board and the courts to "apply general agency principles in distinguishing between emplyees and independent contractors under Act." In applying agency principles the Board and the courts look at all aspects of an individual's relationship with the putative employer. Although no one part of the relationship is determinative, the degree of supervision over the means and manner of performing the task assigned is most important in determining whether a relationship is that of employee or independent contractor.

The Board, in Comedy Store, 265 NLRB 1422 (1982), considered business expenses incurred by the individuals found to be independent contractors. Thus by using the catch phrase "right to control test," the other general principles of agency used to distinguish between employees and independent contractors cannot be ignored. All the aspects of the water truck owner-operators' relationship with the contractors, as presented in the record, will be considered.

One test is whether the contractor exercised control over the manner and means of performance. Seafarers Local 777 v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 862 (D.C. Cir. 1978). Before October 1983, when the owner-operators got a job, after soliciting various construction companies, usually by telephone, and leaving their names with dispatchers, they went on the companies' payroll at the rate established in the master labor agreement, with deductions for taxes and stated benefits, and they rented their trucks to the contractor at an hourly rate.[6] The owner-operator kept track of the hours worked which was certified daily by the job superintendent or other agent of the contractor. There is no requirement that the owner-operator take a job offered by a contractor or give any reason for such a refusal.[7] Bell has admitted that the rental rate for leasing his truck to a contractor was subject to negotiation. Id. at 280.[8] This evidences a relative bargaining power not indicative of an employer-employee relationship. NLRB v. Associated Diamond Cabs, 702 F.2d 912, 921 (11th Cir. 1983).

The owner-operators have the responsibility of getting the equipment to the jobsite. Generally, water trucks are used to control dust and for soil compaction. On the days their services are needed, they generally keep the same work hours as the contractor's employees and their hours can be unilaterally changed by the employer. Id. at 280. They are paid if they are idle on the project for a few hours, unlike dump truck drivers in the other cases involving this Union, cited above. There was no showing if this operating practice was necessary to properly meet the demands of proper performance by general contractors or subcontractors using the water trucks. If the owner-operator is not needed for a few hours or a day or two, there was no bar by the contractor against their working for another contractor. Id. at 280. In fact, Williams did this on at least one occasion (Tr. 85).

The owner-operators are responsible for filling their own water trucks. They did not punch a timeclock. As noted above, they kept record of the hours they worked as certified by the superintendent or another agent of the contractor on a daily basis. There was no showing how employees such as laborers kept track of their time. After filling the trucks, they either went to an agent of the contractor for brief instructions, or just went to the worksite knowing what to do from the previous day's activities. The owner-operators are skilled in their occupation, knowing at times where to spray water without instructions. Occasionally a foreman, superintendent, or grade checker would have an application needing instruction where to spray or the amount of spray. At times it is necessary to communicate with the owner-operator using hand signals, but the majority of times the owner-operators would know where to go after they determine what the job requires. After a break in time, communication of a supervisory or instructional nature averages about 5 minutes a day. The amount of instruction time at the commencement of a job was not shown to be appreciably greater. The owner-operators often move from job to job but this is not unusual in the construction industry. These factors therefore do not clearly betoken employee status.

The contractor could disqualify an owner-operator based on dissatisfaction. Although there was a belief that owner-operators could receive discipline in the same manner as employees, such as suspension, there was no evidence that discipline other than discharge was ever imposed. Discharge is the exercise of a right of contractual control by being bound only to persons who can satisfactorily perform the work. NLRB v. Associated Diamond Cabs, supra, 702 F.2d at 921. The right to discharge, therefore, is not demonstrative of employee status.

The extent of control the contractor exercises over the owner-operators in this case is not a clear indicia of employment status. The techniques and skills of driving a water truck do not require extensive oversight if the driver is qualified. The right to control the manner of performance is not closely established in where the drivers are often on their own and follow established procedures and practices. There are few occasions for the assertion of control over the water truck drivers for most of their work. In such cases as this, consideration must be given to the "important distinction . . . between service under an agreement to accomplish results or to use care and skill in accomplishing results." Restatement 2d, Agency § 220, comment (e) (1957). The various indicia of control must be balanced and individually examined. There is no convincing showing that the contractor controlled the manner and means of the drivers' performance compared to mere control over the end result. Seafarers Local 777, supra, 603 F.2d at 874–875; NLRB v. Deaton, Inc., supra, 502 F.2d at 1224.

[6] According to Thomas C. Blevins, a dispatcher for the contractor C. W. Poss, brokers call him all the time to get work for water truck owner-operators.

[8] After 1 October 1983, the owner-operators worked for contractors at a flat hourly rate.

While the control elements presented in this case are not a clear indication of status, the other indicia are clearly characteristic of independent contractors. The owner-operators own their own equipment and use only that equipment while so employed. As the court held in Seafarers Local 777, supra, 603 F.2d at 878:

> In the usual employment relationship, the employer not only owns the instrumentalities of labor, but also supplies them free of charge to the worker. Rather than leasing out tools so that the "employees" can pursue their chosen ends, the typical employer hires the employees to operate his machines in order to accomplish his chosen ends.

They also maintain their own equipment, provide the tools for the maintenance, and pay for insurance, gasoline, oil, tires, and licensing. They deduct depreciation for their vehicles on their tax returns. The owner-operators' involvement is substantial. Williams purchased a water truck for about $15,000 which he currently valued at $10,000.[9] He has a 1967 Ford pickup which he uses to carry his maintenance tools and it has a fuel tank to fuel the water truck. He operates under the name of Williams Water Truck Service. A separate checking account is maintained in this name. Prior to October 1983, the bills for leasing of the truck to various contractors were sent with a letterhead reading, "Williams Water Truck Service." On 1 July 1975, Williams signed a "Southern California Teamsters Construction Short Form" indicative of his right to hire others to drive the water truck.[10] Williams identified a document as "the check file signature card for the water truck business." This statement indicates that the acquisition of work was done under the belief he was operating a business separate and apart from the contractor.[11]

> Among the factors considered significant at common law in connection with the "right to control" test in determining whether an employment relationship exists are (1) whether individuals perform functions that are an essential part of the company's normal operation or operate an independent business; (2) whether they have a permanent working arrangement with the company which will ordinarily continue as long as performance is satisfactory; (3) whether they do business in the company's name with assistance and guidance from the company's personnel and ordinarily sell only the company's products; (4) whether the agreement which contains the terms and conditions under which they operate is promulgated and changed unilaterally by the company; (5) whether they account to the company for the funds they collect under a regular reporting procedure prescribed by the company; (6) whether particular skills are required for the operations subject to the contract; (7) whether they have a proprietary interest in the work in which they are engaged; and (8) whether they have the opportunity to make decisions which involve risks taken by the independent businessman which may result in profit or loss.[3]

[3] Standard Oil Company, 230 NLRB 967, 968 (1977), citing N.L.R.B. v. United Insurance Company, supra; N.L.R.B. v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Mansfield, Ohio, 455 F.2d 1134, 1141 (6th Cir. 1972), and Restatement of Agency 2d § 220 (1958).

Bell owns two water trucks, a 1961 International and a 1948 Peterbilt respectively valued by him at $25,000 and $15,000. He also has two pickup trucks, a 1971 Ford that has a fuel tank and tools in it which is valued at between $2500 and $3000 and a 1982 Ford pickup with tools and a fuel tank worth about $12,000. Bell uses the pickup trucks to transport fuel and to have tools available for the water trucks when he is on a job. He fuels and maintains the water truck before and after work. He drives the International most of the time and rents the Peterbilt truck to a contractor on an hourly basis. The contractor provides the driver, and pays the driver's wages and other benefits for the Peterbilt truck. The Peterbilt truck has the name "Bell's Water Truck Service" on it; no name appears on the International. There is undisputed evidence that owner-operators' water trucks often have names other than the contractor affixed to them.

Carpenter owns a Kenworth truck valued at between $20,000 and $30,000 and a 1972 Ford pickup truck which has fuel tanks and toolboxes. Carpenter's truck does not have a logo or sign on it. None of the owner-operators who testified affix the contractor's name to their trucks.

It is found that the owner-operators have a substantial financial involvement in equipment and bear the risk of any loss or damage to the equipment. Associated General Contractors v. NLRB, supra, 564 F.2d at 281, citing SIDA of Hawaii v. NLRB, 512 F.2d 354 (9th Cir. 1975); Brown v. NLRB, 462 F.2d 699 (9th Cir. 1972), cert. denied 409 U.S. 1008 (1972). The owner-operators retain all the attributes of ownership even though they lease the equipment to the contractor. Merchants Home Delivery Service v. NLRB, supra, 580 F.2d at 975. The individual's ability [9] New water trucks cost between $65,000 and $80,000.

[10] Williams claims he sold his water truck to his son on 1 May 1983. His son is attending college full time, never drove the truck, and was never credibly shown to have entered into a good-faith purchase. The failure of the Union to register and refer Williams after this asserted sale is not indicative of a proscribed motive, or a violation of the Act.

[11] Capitol Parcel Delivery Co., 256 NLRB 302 at 303, remanded and supplemental decision and order issued at 269 NLRB 52 (1984). The the water truck owner-operators, like any individuals who make their livelihood in the construction industry, often work for several contractors, moving from job to job. Restatement 2d, Agency § (2)(f). There was no showing that the employer retained the right to reject owner-operator's vehicles which failed to meet any set standards. Georgia Pacific Corp., 249 NLRB 1280 (1980). Nor were the drivers subjected to any examination. No other drivers could be assigned unilaterally to operate the truck by the employer. Propane Transport, 247 NLRB 966 (1980).

Thus, under the standard common law criteria, it is concluded that the water truck drivers in this case are independent contractors within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act, not employees. The Union was correct in informing the owner-operators that they could not be dispatched as owner-operators and then be free to operate as independent contractors. The Union instituted membership requirements which it deemed necessary to insure that they dispatched only employees. The requirement of signing a declaration of divestiture of equipment was designed to meet these requirements and was not alleged, in itself, to be violative of the Act. The owner-operators all testified they wished to be dispatched as employees and operate their own equipment. There was no evidence that they were denied registration and referral as employees who would not operate their own equipment. Thus, while the divestiture requirement may arguably be too severe, it was not argued or shown to be an unlawful restraint on membership, registration, and/or referral. The failure to register and/or refer individuals who are indpendent contractors is not a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and/or (2). Section 8(b)(1)(A) only protects employees in their exercise of Section 7 rights. Roofers Local 66 (Sierra Employers Assn.), 267 NLRB 601 (1983). Similarly, finding water truck drivers are independent contractors within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act requires a conclusion that Respondent has not violated Section 8(b)(2) of the Act. Teamsters Local 814 (Santini Bros.), 208 NLRB 184 (1974), reaffd. 223 NLRB 752 (1976), enfd. 546 F.2d 989 (D.C. Cir. 1976). This allegation of the complaint should be dismissed. See Operating Engineers Local 18 (Ohio Contractors Assn.), 204 NLRB 681 (1973), remanded per curiam 496 F.2d 1308 (6th Cir. 1974), reaffd. 220 NLRB 147 (1975), enf. denied 555 F.2d 552 (6th Cir. 1977). Teamsters Local 515 (Roundway Express), 248 NLRB 83 (1980).

B. Allegations Derivative from the Events of July 1

1. Pleadings

The General Counsel charges in the complaint that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act as follows:

> 8. At all times material herein, pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement as described above in paragraph 6, Respondent has maintained and administered an exclusive job referral system at Respondent's Bakersfield, California office which ... employer-members of the Contractors operating within the jurisdiction of Respondent's Bakersfield, California office. Such referral system includes employment lists as defined in Article II of the collective-bargaining agreement.[12]
> 9. On or about July 1, 1983, at Respondent's Bakersfield, California office, Williams, in the presence of Shain, complained to Jessie Harer, hereinafter called Harer, about his placement on the employment list as maintained by Respondent at its Bakersfield, California office.[13]
> 10. On or about August 1, 1983, Respondent, acting through Harer, filed intra union charges against Williams and Shain.
> 11. On or about August 28, 1983, Respondent, acting through its seven-member Executive Board comprised of George Branson, Lawrence Burke, Bill Elliott, Wayne Epperson, Shirley Holt, Willie, Seay, and William Joyner:
> (a) expelled Williams and Shain from membership in Respondent effective July 1, 1983;
> (b) imposed court collectible fines of $1,500 each on Williams and Shain;
> (c) prohibited both Williams and Shain from entering Respondent's property for any purpose whatsoever; and
> (d) removed Shain from his office as Respondent of Respondent and barred him forever from holding any office with Respondent.[14]

2. Events of 1 July

The finding that Williams is an independent contractor does not eliminate the need to discuss his involvement in these allegations for he could still register as an employee if he took reasonable steps to not assume the work as an owner-operator independent contractor, and the allegations also pertain to Shain, who is admittedly an employe as defined in the Act.

It is undisputed that Shain, the president of the local, and Williams casually met the morning of 1 July 1983 and came into the union hall to register as out of work, as required by the valid union procedure. Shain went to Barbara McNeil's window and started to register. Prior to registering, Williams checked a posted out-of-work list and noticed that his name was not on the list; another name, Steve Casen, appeared twice at numbers 30 and 31. Williams should have been number 30. The posted list was admitted to be unofficial and in error. Williams went to the window manned by Jessie Harer, Respondent's office manager and recording secretary to the local's board, an elected position. Williams asked why his name was not on the list. He also told her to "keep her damn hands off his name on the out of work list." Harer admitted the error. The subsequent actions and statements of Williams and Harer are in dispute. Harer asserts Williams was yelling at her in a threatening manner and when he told her to keep her hands off his name on the list he shook his fist and finger at her. Harer was very upset over the incident, which reduced her to tears. Williams denies making any verbal or physical threats.

All the individuals in the small office area, save the office clerical, Barbara McNeil,[15] did not observe Williams screaming and yelling at Harer, threaten Harer either verbally or physically. Alan De Gough, a member of the Union, did overhear Williams tell Harer in a loud voice she was to keep her "goddamned hand off his name on the out-of-work list." De Gough would not characterize Williams as screaming, his tone was close to a shout. De Gough left before Williams. Albert Matthews, another member present at the start of the incident, testified Williams "raised his voice a little bit" and asked Harer about his name not being on the out-of-work list. Matthews then left with Shain. Later that day, Matthews called Harer because "I just like Jessie and felt like that mainly she would enjoy somebody consoling her," because "he [Williams] had his voice raised a little high."

Wayne Young, who also was present only for the first part of the conversation, corroborated the testimony that Williams spoke in a louder than normal voice, he did not shout, and did not make a verbal or physical threat in his presence. Based on demeanor, clarity of recall, and position as an uninvolved neutral observer, Young's testimony is credited.

McNeil testified she asked Shain if he could stop Williams. Her testimony is devoid of any indication that Shain heard her. When McNeil testified, she was very soft spoken. Shain did not respond or look up. McNeil did not repeat the request. There was no testimony indicating Shain heard her and ignored or refused her request. Shain testified without refutation that he did not hear McNeil make such a request. There is also no indication that Shain knowledgeably refused or refrained from interfering with Williams in his protest or any other actions considered protected by the Act. See Myers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984). Shain left with Matthews and Young shortly after the Williams-Harer conversation started. Williams came out of the office shortly thereafter. McNeil did not ask anyone else for help and did not use the telephone or other instrumentatily to seek help.[16] This inaction contradicts her claim of fear and concern. However, this contradiction was not shown to have been known to Respondent prior to this trial.

Shortly after Williams left Harer, Don Frazer, a business representative and vice president of the Union, arrived at the union hall. McNeil told him Harer was in the bathroom crying and her version of what transpired with Williams. Frazer knew Williams was standing on the front porch and asked him to step inside Art Branson's[17] office. Frazer asked Williams:

> . . . what the problem had been and he said that his name had been left off the out-of-work list, and I advised him at that time that that wasn't a very logical reason to be terrorizing the office staff, that their job function was to help the members when they come in with health and welfare problems, to write letters and answer the telephone, such likes as that. If he had a problem with the way the union was being run, he should bring that problem to Branson or myself.
> Q. Did he respond to that?
> A. He no doubt had something to say but not a great lot. I don't really recall what he said specifically. I was pretty—pretty angry myself.
> Q. How long did the conversation last?
> A. Not very long. I advised him that the only thing that kind of conduct would get him would be a trip in front of the executive board and he wouldn't like that. And then I asked him to leave, and he did

About a month later, on 1 August, Harer filed the following charges:

> This will serve to advise you that I am filing charges against Brother Don Williams and President Harry Shain for the following offenses constituting a violation of the International Constitution, Article XIX—Section 6—(b) 1, 2, 5, & 6[18] and Local 87's Bylaws, Section 19, (E) 1 & 3.[19]

[15] McNeil was not a credible witness based on demeanor principally. She tended to embellish the facts to bolster the Union's case, rather than testify in a candid, forthright manner.

[16] McNeil's testimony is inconsistent. Initially she said Shain was signing his name when she asked him to help and he just said, "la-de-da-de-da." Subsequently she said Shain was looking at her when she said she made the request, getting ready to sign his card.

[17] Branson is the secretary/treasurer of the Union; the chief executive officer.

[18] These sections of the International constitution provide:

(b) The basis for charges against members, officers, elected Business Agents, Local Unions, Joint Councils or other subordinate bodies for which he or it shall stand trial shall consist of, but not be limited to, the following:

(1) Violation of any specific provision of the Constitution, Local Union Bylaws or rules or order, or failure to perform any of the duties specified thereunder.

(2) Violation of oath of office or the oath of loyalty to the Local Union and the International Union

. . . .

(5) Conduct which is disruptive of, interferes with, or induces others to disrupt or interfere with, the performance of any union's legal or contractual obligations. Causing or participating in an unauthorized strike or work stoppage.

(6) Disruption of Union meetings, or assaulting or provoking assault on fellow members or officers, or failure to follow the rules of order or rulings of the presiding officer at meetings of the Local Union, or any similar conduct in or about union premises or places used to conduct union business.

[19] The bylaws state:

E. Responsibility of Members to the Local Union

1. Every member by virtue of his membership in this Local Union is obligated to abide by these Bylaws and the International Constitution with respect to his rights, duties, privileges and immunities conferred by them. Each member shall faithfully carry out such duties and obligations and shall not interfere with the rights of fellow members.

. . . .

3. No member shall interfere with the elected officers or business agents of this organization in the performance of their duties, and each member shall, when requested, render such assistance and support in the performance of such duties as may be required by them, provided that this does not interfere with the individual rights of members. Each member and officer shall adhere to the terms and conditions of pertinent collective bargaining agreements and shall refrain from any conduct that would interfere with the performance by this Local Union of its legal or contractual obligations.

On Friday, July 1, 1983, Brother Don Williams and President Harry Shain came into the office together. President Harry Shain went to Barbara McNeil's window, Brother Don Williams came to my window. Brother Williams immediately initiated a violent attack and verbal assault upon me for a clerical error that occurred in our office.

He shouted, cursed, screamed and threatened[20] me in the presence of members and told me to "keep my god damn hands off his name on the construction out of work list."

President Harry Shain refused to assist another Officer in performance of duties, altho he was requested to do so, nor would he defend the integrity of the Local Union. He stood idly by and witnessed the entire abusive confrontation without offering assistance and left with Don Williams.

I hereby respectfully request that the charges be heard at the earliest possible date.

Harer explained the delay of a month in filing charges as being occasioned by discussions she had with her husband over the incident where she felt that a clerical employee should not be subjected to such incidents and her own knowledge that the executive board did not meet until August. Harer was of the opinion that she should not have been subjected to the confrontation as a means of retaining her job and that Shain, as president of the Local, had a responsibility to protect her "in her representation of the union."

It is the General Counsel's position that Williams was engaged in protected concerted activity for he was complaining about the operation of the hiring hall, i.e., his name being left off the out-of-work list. Derivatively, it is alleged that Respondent violated the Act because Shain was charged and disciplined for conduct which was the failure to interfere with the protected act of another. The threshold issue therefore is whether Williams' conduct was protected.

The finding that Williams was an owner-operator and therefore an independent contractor does not alter the fact that on July 1 he was attempting to sign the out-of-work list as an employee. There were occasions when he accepted dispatches in a role other than owner-operator. There was no showing that any of the activities on July 1 were related to his role as owner-operator. There is no contention that he did not have the right on 1 July to register on the out-of-work list as an employee and that his actions were other than an attempt to so register. There is also no showing that he would not accept employment from a referral as an employee rather than an owner-operator or independent contractor.

The next matter to be considered is whether the Respondent Union was motivated by Williams' past intraunion activities, including opposition to Respondent's decision to lay off Shain and retain Frazer as a business agent; his criticisms of Frazer about March 1983 with regard to dispatches of two nonmembers, one Frazer's son-in-law, to what was referred to as the "Mason job" in Caliente; and a complaint to Frazer about overtime and the filing of a charge about the misdispatches on 12 August 1983. Respondent argues that the record is insufficient in showing the reasons for the discipline were pretexts, that an employee engaged in activity which was improper and even if this occurred during protected action, it does not save him from discipline for such improper conduct. The nexus to determining whether a violation occurred therefore is determining whether the Union processed the charges and disciplined Williams and Shain for prescribed reasons.

Harer filed the charge on 1 August, approximately 1 month after the incident. Her chare filed against Williams and Shain prior to Williams' filing charges against the Union for misdispatching on 12 August 1983. Accordingly, it cannot be found that Harer's actions were in any way induced by Williams engaging in the protected activity of filing a charge against the Union.

In contemplation of filing charges, Harer asked Frazer to act in a position analogous to prosecutor in the conduct of the trial board. Frazer, consonant with the requirements of the Union's constitution and bylaws, stepped down from the executive board to assume this pseudoprosecutorial role. Harer also was not going to sit on the panel. In fact, of approximately seven executive board members, only two sat on the panel, George Branson and Tiny Burke. Prior to 1 August, again in contemplation of the filing of the charges, Frazer asked several union members if they would serve on a trial board. Branson interviewed five individuals, telling these prospective trial board members that the subject matter was delicate, that one union official was charged as well as a member for an incident occurring in the office, and they wanted to ensure that the prospective trial board members could render a fair and unbiased decision. It is undisputed that Frazer's asking individuals if they would be interested in serving on the trial board was unprecedented and occurred prior to the actual filing of the charge. Frazer's solicitation of three members to sit on the trial board[21] was not considered by Branson to be proper procedure. However, Branson interviewed them all. No one who served on the trial board as voting members were called to appear and testify and there was no indication that only members of a particular proclivity were selected or that Frazer's actions bespeak discriminatory motive.

At the trial board Branson, who was chairman of the trial board and did not have a vote, called Shain a liar and accused him of stirring up trouble with members ever since he was laid off as a business agent. Shain was laid off as a business agent in January 1983. The decision was Branson's. Branson decided to retain Frazer as business agent. Shain complained to Branson that Frazer had less seniority with that local than he. Branson replied that, in his view, Frazer was doing a better job, that he did not have a contract and was not obligated to follow seniority in hiring and firing or any other executive decision. Williams told Frazer in early 1983 that he thought that Shain was a better business agent. Frazer candidly admitted a personal dislike for both Williams and Shain, stating he felt that Shain was less than candid and opining Williams was a loudmouth rebel who liked to intimidate others. There was no showing that Frazer participated in the trial board's decisionmaking process.

[20] In her testimony, Harer admitted Williams did not verbally threaten her, and she also testified elsewhere that the only reason she filed the charges was because Williams yelled at her. As indicated above, the threat was asserted to be shaking his finger and fist at her.

The trial board, held on 20 August, after Shain and Williams filed charges with the Board, included Frazer raising questions about Shain being guilty of misdispatching. Frazer asserts he raised this issue as demonstrative of credibility. Harer read a statement to the trial board wherein she mentioned Williams failed to register on one occasion on the out-of-work list and she, consonant with established practice, removed his name from the list.[22] Harer explained she raised the incident as a possible explanation for Williams' conduct on 1 July for she could not understand why the typographical error on the list, known to be unofficial and not used by the Union for dispatching, could have so upset him.

The trial board found Williams and Shain guilty of all charges; expelled them from membership in the Union effective 1 July; removed Shain from the office of president and barred him from future office holding; fined them $1500 each; prohibited them from entering the union's property for any purpose whatsoever; and extended to them the right to register and be dispatched by telephone. This decision was appealed to the Joint Council of Teamsters No. 38 which found there was no clear showing that Shain heard the argument and, thus, that he did not violate the International constitution or local bylaws as charged by Harer. All penalties imposed by the trial board, as here pertinent, were removed with regard to Shain. Williams was found guilty of abusive verbal conduct, fined $500 of which $300 was suspended provided he did not engage in similar conduct within a year. All other penalties, as here pertinent, were revoked and both were restored to membership in good standing.

The International's reversal of the Local Union's action and its removal of all penalties imposed by the Local because of Harer's charges[23] does not abrogate any potential violation by the Local Union for its actions because the joint board of the International did not repudiate the Local's conduct. Auto Workers Local 1989 (Caterpillar Tractor Co)., 249 NLRB 922 at 924 (1980): "Thus, the mere withdrawal of charges against the employees in an absence of action specifically repudiating the coercive effect of Respondent's conduct is clearly insufficient."

3. Discussion

The General Counsel argues that by disciplining and fining Shain and Williams, the Union illegally restrained and coerced members in the exercise of Williams' right to protest hiring hall procedures in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for a union:

> . . . to restrain or coerce . . . employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7; Provided, That this paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein.

The sweeping nature of the proviso to Section 8(b)(1)(A) was described by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 175, 181, as follows:

> Integral to . . . federal labor policy has been the power in the chosen union to protect against erosion of its status under that policy through reasonable discipline of members who violate rules and regulations governing membership.

This proviso results in the granting of some immunity to the unions for what may arguably be considered restraint or coercion of employees in the exercise of Section 7 rights. For example, the Board has found that a union fining members respecting the acquisition or retention of membership does not violate the Act. See, e.g., Musicians (George Doerner), 165 NLRB 798 (1967), enfd. 395 F.2d 401 (2d Cir. 1968).

However, as held in Teamsters Local 557 (Liberty Transfer), 218 NLRB 1117, 1120 (1975):

> It is now well established that the immunity accorded a union by the proviso with respect to the internal enforcement of its rules and policies is not an unqualified one. The proviso, it has been held, does not leave a union free to enforce union rules or policies which serve no legitimate union interest or run counter to other public policies of an overriding nature that Congress has imbedded in the labor laws.

As the Supreme Court stated in Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423, 430 (1969):

> Section 8(b)(1) leaves a union free to enforce a properly adopted rule which reflects a legitimate union interest, impairs no policy Congress has imbedded in the labor law, and is reasonably enforced against union members who are free to leave the union and escape the rule.

In applying this test to the facts in Scofield, the Court "focused its inquiry on the legitimacy of the union interst sought to be encouraged by the rule and the extent to which the rule contravened any policy of the Act." Operating Engineers Local 39 (San Jose Hospital), 240 NLRB 1122 (1979). The fact that any action taken by the union in conjunction with the rule may be internal "affords no immunity to a union when . . . [that action] 'invades or frustrates an overriding policy of the labor laws.'" Thus, to determine the legitimacy of the union action, "we must balance the legtimacy of the union interest at stake

[22] There is no allegation of wrongdoing by Williams with regard to his failure to register on the out-of-work list. Williams' unrefuted testimony is that he worked overtime the first few days of the job and did not have access to a telephone during the union business office hours. It was not unusual where members delayed several days in informing the Union that they have found work.

[23] Shain was fined for another matter that was completely unrelated to the issues in the complaint as stipulated to by the parties herein.

with the interest claimed to be contravened by the union action." Id. at 1123.

Scofield listed the following requirements for lawful imposition of union discipline under the Act:

> Section 8(b)(1)(A) leaves a union free to enforce (1) a properly adopted rule which (2) reflects a legimtate union interest, (3) impairs no policy which Congress has imbedded in the labor laws, and (4) is reasonably enforced against union members who are free to leave the union and escape the rule. [Supra at 423.]

Respondent's argument that Williams was an independent contractor and not entitled to the protections of Section 7 has been found above to be unpersuasive since there was no showing by the Union that he was registering solely to work as an owner-operator and would refuse any dispatches as an employee. Respondent also argues that since Williams' conduct was directed against a clerical employee, his actions were removed from the protection of the Act. This argument is also found to be without merit. The charges filed by Harer specifically stated that Shain "refused to assist another officer in performance of duties." The trial board found him guilty of those charges. Harer is also the recording secretary of the board and the bylaws and constitution refer to obligations to officers; Harer is also a union member and member of the executive board. This argument does not address the General Counsel's position that the allegation by Harer was a mere ruse to hide the fact that Williams and Shain were being discriminated against because of their engaging in protected activity, including Williams' filing of grievances and charges with the board or Shain's failure to interfere with Williams' engaging in such protected rights as complaining to the union about its operation of the hiring hall.

The question is whether Respondent subjected Williams and Shain to the trial board and disciplined them because they violated legitimate union rules or because of prescribed motives aroused because Williams and Shain engaged in rights protected by Section 7 of the Act.

Initially, it is found that the Union did not breach its duty of fair representation to Shain and Williams by holding the trial board and disciplining them. As the Board held in Elevator Constructors Local 8 (San Francisco Elevator), 243 NLRB 53, 55 (1979):

> The duty of fair representation stems from a union's exclusive representative status for the employees of the employer.[8] This duty is relevant only at such times as the union is acting in this representative capacity or otherwise affects the member's employment status. Here, Respondent's actions against Finney were unreleated to any representation of Finney vis-a-vis any employer. Nor did Respondent seek to affect his status as an employee. Therefore, we find its conduct could not constitute a violation of the duty of fair representation.

We therefore find that Respondent did not act unlawfully in fining and removing Finney from office. Accordingly, we dismiss these allegations of the complaint.[9]

[8] Miranda Fuel Company, Inc., 140 NLRB 181 at 184 (1962).

[9] The General Counsel's allegation of breach of duty of fair representation was not specifically stated in the complaint. It is found that the allegation had been encompassed in the verbiage of the complaint even though not specifically alleged.

As held in Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171 at 177 (1967):

> [T]he exclusive agent's statutory authority to represent all members of a designated unit includes the statutory obligation to serve the interest of all members without hostility or discrimination toward any, to exercise his discretion with complete good faith and honesty, and to avoid arbitratry conduct . . . . It is obvious that [plaintiff's] . . . complaint alleged a breach by the union of duty grounded in federal statutes . . . . Though the allegation is found to be inapplicable to these facts, it is also found to have been fully and fairly tried.

Unit Train Load Sales, 234 NLRB 1265, 1272 (1978). Alexander's Restaurant & Lounge, 228 NLRB 165 (1978), enfd. 586 F.2d 1300, 1304 (9th Cir. 1978). See also Free-Flow Packaging Corp., 219 NLRB 925 (1975), enfd. 556 F.2d 1124 (9th Cir. 1978); and Retail Clerks Local 770 (Frito Co.), 138 NLRB 244 (1962), enfd. in relevant part. 330 F.2d 458 (9th Cir. 1964). It is concluded that this allegation of breach of duty of fair representation is without merit and does not support the finding of a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[24] There was no showing that either Shain's or Wiliams' employment was affected. There was no evidence that they were denied any information concerning employment or were denied proper dispatch. The penalties were not shown to be an action that invades or frustrates overriding policies of labor law. The lack of any proof on this point precludes the drawing of an inference that Respondent, in its operation of an exclusive hiring hall, denied Shain or Williams access to employment or information concerning employment or that any labor policy or Federal policy, such as the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1979, had been violated or frustrated. See Carpenters Local 22 (Graziano Construction), 195 NLRB 1 (1972). citing Teamsters Local 663 (Continental Oil), 193 NLRB 581 (1971). Cf. Southern Steamship Co. v. NLRB, 316 U.S. 31 (1942). Compare Carpenters Local 1976 (Sand Door) v. NLRB, 357 U.S. 93 (1958), and Caesar's Palace, 194 NLRB 140 fn. 5 (1971).

The question of the penalties imposed does have relevance to determination of the issue of whether the charges were brought, pursued, and discipline resulted therefrom based on discriminatory motive. It is undisputed that the charge had already been filed at the time the trial board met. There was no showing that any of the voting trial board members knew of this filing at the time of the trial board. None of the trial board members other than Branson was called to appear and testify. Branson did not vote. Therefore there was an absence of a showing of a causal nexus between the decision to find a violation of the Union's bylaws and constitution and the filing of an unfair labor practice charge against the Union. Similarly, it is undisputed that Williams complained to Frazer about an employer's payment of overtime. There was no indication that Frazer harbored any animus based on this action or even that this action in some manner indicated ineptitute or other adverse inferences in the way Frazer was handling his position. Further, Frazer, in his pseudoprosecutorial role, removed himself from the decision-making milieu of the trial board. Again there was a failure to indicate that any of the voting members of the trial board knew of Williams' filing of grievances or complaints with Frazer or any other official of the Union.

Another basis for the thesis of the General Counsel that the Union disciplined Williams and Shain for exercising rights protected by Section 7 of the Act was the execssive penalty imposed upon the finding of violations of the Union's constitution and bylaws. The record clearly shows that during Branson's 23-year tenure as secretary-treasurer and additional 3-year tenure preceding that as business agent, he could not recall any fine exceeding or even totaling $500. The only other fine Branson could recall in recent history was one trial board in 1981 or 1982 involving a bakery driver being cited for breaching a contract. He believes that discipline was a fine with suspension and probation. The fine he does not think was as much as $500. Save the instant case, he cannot recall any fines or disciplines more severe than the bakery truckdriver. It appears, to place these matters in context, that there were no other charges brought against members that were similar to those brought against Shain and Williams. As found in NLRB v. Boeing Co., 412 U.S. 67 (1963), that the reasonableness of a fine is not one of the criteria for establishing a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. This, however, does not preclude the consideration of the severity of the fine or discipline in ascertaining the reason or purpose for the fine. See Operating Engineers Local 138 (Charles S. Skura), 148 NLRB 679 (1964), and Carpenters Local 1620 (David M. Fisher Construction), 208 NLRB 94 (1974). As the Carpenters case, id. at 99, indicates, the severity of the fine is imparted pertinence in its relationship to past practice and then is considered as part of the total picture in ascertaining the reason or purpose for the fine. In this proceeding, we are not afforded the opportunity to contrast the severity of the fine or discipline with a similar situation. The record does not contain the details of trial board proceedings of the Union; thus there is no facility to evaluate the actions of the trial board based on such a record.

As found in Carpenters Local 1913 (Michael R. Amato), 189 NLRB 521 at 528 (1971):

> The correlative result of a conclusion that the conduct for which Amato was disciplined is not protected by Section 7 is that a judgment as to the reasonableness of the penalty is not the province of the National Labor Relations Board. That is not to say that the Board may not take the scope of the penalty into account in the process of determining whether a union member has been punished for exercising a protected right. Conceivably, in given cases, unprotected conduct may be used as a pretext to punish a union member for exercising a protected right, or the motive for the discipline may be obscure, and in such situations, the relative severity of the penalty might help shed light on its purpose.
> But multiple factors may govern an inquiry whether a penalty was aimed at the exercise of protected rights, and the mere fact that its scope may run counter to the factfinder's perception of what is reasonable does not inevitably spell out an invasion of Section 7 rights. Perceptions of the reasonable in penalties may reasonably vary widely, conditioned by such factors as variations in the behavioral standards of those charged with the responsibility of forming a judgment, or degrees of awareness of the need for the discipline imposed. Wide, but acceptable variations, in assessing damages or imposing penalties are a common experience in the courts. And in examining the range of the penalty as part of an examination of its underlying aim, one not charged with the responsibilities of Local 1913 and the District Council should exercise appropriate caution, lest he improperly invade their province.
> . . . I am unable to find in the discipline such unreasonableness as to warrant a conclusion that its aim was suppression of any protected right of protest.

While there is no question that Williams may freely and fully state his concern or dissatisfaction with the manner with which Respondent conducted its business, there must be a showing that the discipline was because he was exercising Section 7 rights and not because of the manner in which they were exercised. The General Counsel has failed to show pretext for it has failed to show that Respondent's conclusions were not based on Williams' and Shain's actions which were construed as improper and threatening the maintenance of orderly operation of the union hall and abusive conduct to one of the Union's officers and employees. As found in Elevator Constructors Local 8 (San Francisco Elevator), 243 NLRB 53 at 54 (1979):

> Whether or not we agree with that determination is of no moment. Respondent has a right to maintain order and discipline in its meetings and the conduct of its affairs. Its actions in doing so here are not such that can be said to have acted outside its legitimate area of interest and in such a way as to impair any overriding policy of labor law.

In Carpenters Local 1913 (Michael R. Amato), supra, 189 NLRB at 527, it was held that:

> Granting that union discipline of a member, obligated to belong to the union as a condition of employment for conduct protected by Section 7 violates

Section 8(b)(1)(A) if the penalty, although otherwise proper, exceeds reasonable limits,[16] there is an underlying fallacy in the General Counsel's thesis, and that is that Amato was disciplined for exercising Section 7 rights.

It is true as the General Counsel points out, that Local 1913 acts as the agent of the contracting employers in dispatching employees subject to the agreement to jobs, that Section 7 protects the right of such an employee to protest the operation of the contractual dispatch machinery to deny him a referral, and that, as the Seventh Circuit has said, "not every impropriety committed during such (Section 7) activity places the employee beyond the protective shield of the Act" (N.L.R.B. v. Thor Power Tool Company, 351 F.2d 584, 587). But it is also true, as the Court pointed out, that "flagrant conduct of an employee, even though occurring in the course of Section 7 activity, may justify disciplinary action by the employer . . . . The employee's right to engage in concerted activity may permit some leeway for impulsive behavior, which must be balanced against the employer's right to maintain order and respect" (id). And one need hardly add that a union that serves as the employer's hiring agent has a comparable "right" at its hiring facility.

[16] Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423; see also NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 175, and NLRB v. Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers, 391 U.S. 418.

The General Counsel asserts that Williams' conduct was not so flagrant as to justify disciplinary action by the employer during the course of his Section 7 activity. The General Counsel does not dispute that the Union has a right to maintain peace and order in its facility and to protect its employees, members, and officers against undue harassment as a method of retaining trust in the fairness of the operation by its members and to protect its representatives and agents from unwarranted abuse while conducting their duties. It is undisputed that Williams, after being told that the list did contain a typographical error, that he was on the list, that a name appeared twice, for which Harer apologized, and Williams continued to be very abusive, using strong language in a strident voice despite assurances that the matter would be corrected immediately. Harer clearly felt threatened and the threatening of an individual engaged in the dispatch process is a matter to be avoided and was not the exercise of a Section 7 rights.

The evidence of record requires the conclusion that Harer filed charges against Williams and Shain which resulted in their discipline, not because Williams disagreed with or protested the clearly erroneous unofficial dispatch sheet but because of the manner of raising that protest which reduced Harer to tears, greatly upset her, and disturbed the peaceful and orderly operation of the hiring hall.

The General Counsel did not claim or demonstrate that the filing of the charges and the conduct of the proceedings violated the regular disciplinary procedures of the Union or the International. Although Frazer's solicitation of potential members for the trial board occasioned by the unusual nature of the events occurred prior to the actual filing of the charge, this has not been shown to be contrary to any bylaw or constitutional provision nor was it shown to be other than diligence in ensuring orderly processing in an expeditious manner of a forthcoming charge. As noted above, there is no warrant supporting a conclusion that the trial board based its decision on any matter other than the evidence before it. The evidence was not shown to have mentioned the filing of a charge by Williams with the Board, Williams' grievance or complaints filed with the Union or otherwise, or Shain's intraunion activities.

There was no basis to find that the evidence before the trial board, which was not clearly described in this record, may have led individuals who were not used to adjudicating in a legal sense and should not be judged by the criteria normally utilized in determining the propriety of evidentiary hearings and judicial proceedings, could not have reasonably led to the conclusion that Williams abused an employee, member, and representative of the Local while in the discharge of her dutiies.

Similarly, the record fails to show that the disciplinary action against Shain was motivated by proscribed reasons. Branson candidly admitted that Shain was dissatisfied, and was stirring up trouble with members since he was laid off as a business agent in January 1983. Although Shain testified at this trial that he intended to run for the position of secretary-treasurer, Branson's unrefuted testimony was that the first day he heard of it was 16 February 1984 and it cannot be found as a motivating factor in Respondent's actions. Branson had planned to retire at the end of his current term but reacted to Shain's announcement of his plans to oppose Branson by stating that that altered his plans and he intended to run again. Shain's grousing was not alleged nor was it shown to be a motivating factor in the decision to file charges or to discipline him. As noted above, neither Branson nor Frazer voted. The evidence presented to the trial board was not specifically detailed.

It is found that the facts do not support the General Counsel's allegation and it has not been shown by the preponderance of the evidence that Respondent took its action against Shain and Williams for reasons other than attempting to maintain order in the union hall. It is not unreasonable for a union to assert that an officer and member has an affirmative duty to maintain order and discipline within the hall and to ensure that its officers and employees are not subjected to undue harassment. Respondent has not been shown to have acted unlawfully in fining and disciplining Shain and Williams and the evidence fails to establish that a violation of the Act has occurred. Accordingly, I recommend that the complaint in this proceeding be dismissed in its entirety.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[25]

ORDER

It is ordered that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 24 September 1984 Administrative Law Judge James T. Youngblood issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

We agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating employees, threatening employees with discharge and plant closure, and creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities. For the following reasons, however, we disagree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by berating and disparaging employee Henry Michelle in the presence of other employees because of his union support and activity.[4]

The pertinent facts are as follows. The Union filed a petition 18 October 1983. On 13 December 1983, 2 days before the election, Respondent's terminal manager Wilber Hubble held a meeting in the company lunchroom attended by 19 employees, including Michelle. Hubble informed the employees that he was not supposed to discuss the Union, but he had something to say anyway. He stated that he was a company man and did not want the Union. He further stated that it would be fine if the employees wanted the Union, but they should not follow Michelle as a leader because he was organizing the Union out of revenge because the Company did not give him a salesman's job. Hubble also stated that Michelle was a "parking lot lawyer" who was gathering information and passing out authorization cards.

We view Hubble's statements as legitimate expressions of opinion protected by Section 8(c) of the Act. Hubble did not suggest that the employees refrain from engaging in protected concerted activities, but merely that they consider whether to follow Michelle in view of his apparent personal motives. The statements contained no explicit or implied threats of reprisal or force which would tend to coerce employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. Accordingly, we dismiss this complaint allegation.

Notwithstanding this dismissal we conclude, in agreement with the judge, that the record contains sufficient evidence of unlawful conduct during the critical period to warrant setting aside the 15 December 1983 election.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 2.

"2. By threatening its employees with discharge and plant closure if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act."

2. Delete Conclusion of Law 4.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Haynes Motor Lines, Inc., New Orleans, Louisiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(b).

"(b) Threatening its employees with discharge and plant closure if they support the Union or any other labor organization."

2. Delete paragraph 1(d) and reletter the subsequent paragraph.

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] The administrative law judge incorrectly listed the second case number as 15–CA–7037.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The judge correctly found that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening its employees with plant closure, but he omitted this finding from his Conclusions of Law. We will amend the Conclusions of Law, modify the Order, and issue a new notice to correct this inadvertent error.

[4] Member Hunter agrees with his colleagues in finding the above violations, and in setting aside the election on the basis of the unlawful activity. Consequently, he finds it unnecessary to pass on whether Terminal Manager Hubble's remarks to employees about employee Henry Michelle also violated the Act because they disparaged Michelle.

HAYNES MOTOR LINES, INC.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES T. YOUNGBLOOD, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in New Orleans, Louisiana, on March 22, 1984, pursuant to complaints which issued on January 23 and February 24, alleging that Haynes Motor Lines, Inc. (Haynes or Respondent), engaged in certain acts and conduct in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Respondent filed an answer admitting certain jurisdictional allegations to the complaint but denied the commission of any unfair labor practices. All parties were represented at the hearing, and following the close of the hearing the Respondent filed a brief which has been duly considered.

On the entire record, and from my observations and the demeanor of each witness while testifying and the brief herein, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSION[1]

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent is a Louisiana corporation with an office and place of business located in New Orleans, Louisiana, where it is engaged in the transportation of general merchandise. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaints allege, the Respondent admits, and I find that General Truckdrivers, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers Local No. 270, a/w Internationl Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America, Independent (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

On October 18, 1983,[2] the Union filed a petition to be certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the full-time and regular part-time employees at the Respondent's New Orleans terminal.

Pursuant to a stipulation for certification upon consent election approved on November 16, the Regional Director for Region 15 held an election by secret ballot among the Respondent's employees on December 15. The Union was rejected by a 49–38 vote.

On December 20, the Union filed five objections to the election. The Regional Director overruled four of these objections, but ordered that a hearing be held to resolve the Union's Objection 2, which alleged that in a meeting with employees the Respondent created the impression of surveillance of its employees' union activities and berated certain prounion employees. He also ordered that the hearing be consolidated with the hearing on the complaint in Case 15–CA–9207. On February 27, 1984, the Board issued its Decision and Order in Case 15–RC–2037 referring the case back to the Regional Director for the purpose of arranging a hearing pursuant to the Regional Director's report.

On January 23, 1984, the complaint in Case 15–CA–9207 issued alleging that since on or about December 13, 1983, the Respondent by its supervisor and agent Butch Hubbel created the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities by informing employees that he knows which employee is responsible for initiating the union organizing campaign and berated and disparaged an employee in the presence of other employees because of his union support and activities. Also on January 23,

[1] The facts found herein are a compilation of the credited testimony, the exhibits, and stipulations of fact, viewed in light of logical consistency and inherent probability. Although these findings may not contain or refer to all of the evidence, all has been weighed and considered. To the extent that any testimony or other evidence not mentioned in this decision may appear to contradict my findings of fact, I have not disregarded that evidence but have rejected it as incredible, lacking in probative weight, surplusage, or irrelevant. Credibility resolutions have been made on the basis of the whole record, including the inherent probabilities of the testimony and the demeanor of the witnesses. Where it may be required I will set forth specific credibility findings.

1984, the Regional Director issued an order consolidating the complaint in Case 15–CA–9207 and the objection in 15–RC–7036 for a hearing. On February 24, 1984, the Regional Director issued a complaint in Case 15–CA–9237 allleging additional violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, and also consolidating that complaint with the previous complaint and objection.

Paragraphs 6(a) and (b) of the complaint issued in Case 15–CA–9237 allege that in or about the week prior to Thanksgiving 1983, and on or about December 3, 1983, the Respondent through its supervisor and agent Sam Haynes, at its New Orleans facility, created the impression of surveillance of employees' union activity by informing employees that he knew which employee is responsible for initiating the union organizing campaign.

Paragraph 7 of this complaint also alleges that Bill Rabelais, the Respondent's supervisor, on various dates between November 30 and December 16, threatened employees with discharge, created the impression of surveillance, and interrogated employees regarding their union sympathies and activities.

Edward Collins testified that he was employed by the Respondent from January 2, 1983, until January 13, 1984. Collins testified that around the time the employees learned that there was to be an election he was called into a meeting conducted by Sam Haynes, Respondent's president. There were approximately seven other employees in this meeting. Collins testified that Haynes said, "He was talking about—how he first started out, he say, well, I know who kicked off the union deal because his feelings got hurt. He wanted a position in the office as a salesman but we turned him down for other reasons." Collins stated that Haynes said that the Respondent would close down and move to Baton Rouge if the Union was to come in. Collins also said that Haynes told the employees of approximately 75 other companies that had shut down as a result of union problems.

Collins testified that during the week of the election he had a meeting with Bill Rabelais in Rabelais' office. Collins stated that Rabelais told him to have a seat, and then "he asked me whether I am for the Union or not." When Collins did not respond, Rabelais asked him again if he was for the Union or not. Collins told him that he did not know himself. Collins stated that Rabelais said that Haynes will close down, lock up these gates, and take his business to Baton Rouge if the Union got in.

Collins testified that on the day of the election Rabelais was wearing a "Vote No" sign or button. On that day he went with Rabelais to the tire shed where the election was being held and that he and Rabelais entered the tire shed to get a tire. Henry Michelle informed the Board agent that Rabelais was a supervisor. The Board agent then asked Rabelais what his title was and when he was told that he was a foreman, the Board agent told Rabelais to leave, at which point both he and Collins left. As they were nearing the mechanics' shop Rabelais said, "Well, I going to find who's for the union and get rid of them." Collins testified that on the day after the election Rabelais came into the terminal in the morning and stated that "we're going to find out who is for the union and get rid of them slowly but surely." Collins said that there were about five to six employees present in the mechanic shop when this statement was made.

Henry Michelle testified that he has been employed by the Respondent since June 20, 1981. On December 13, he was called into the lunchroom along with 18 other employees for a meeting with Wilber Hubble, the Respondent's terminal manager.

Michelle testified that Hubble said he was not supposed to talk about the Union but he did have something to say about it anyway. He stated that he was a company man and did not want the union. He said that if the employees want the Union that is fine, but do not follow Michelle as a leader because all he wants is revenge. Michelle testified that Hubble told the employees that Michelle had been asking for a saleman's job and when he did not get it he got the Union for revenge. He stated that Hubble said he was a parking lot lawyer and that he was gathering information and passing out union cards; that he had seen Michelle passing out union cards on the dock. Hubble admitted telling the employees that he knew Michelle was the union organizer and he was doing this because the company was not letting him be a saleman and that he resented the fact that the company took away a lunch period. He told the employees that they should not follow Michelle.

Charles Brister testified that he was employed by the Respondent in late June 1983, and discharged in December 1983. He testified that sometime during the first week of December he was present at a meeting where Sam Haynes talked about the Union. He said there were six or seven other employees present and, to his knowledge, there were no other supervisors. He stated that Haynes started off talking about the Union and stating "how he would not be intimidated by letting the union come in and tell him how to run his business." Haynes also said, "before he'd let the union come in and tell him how to run his business he would close down and sell his dock equipment, the trucks, and move to Baton Rouge." Brister stated that he mentioned other trucking companies that went out of business because of the union. Brister testified that he attended another meeting held by Haynes during the second week in December, just before the election. This meeting took place in the personnel office and there were about six other employees present, and again there were no other supervisors present. He stated that Haynes told them that this would be the last time that he would see them before the election, and "if the union got in we wouldn't have to worry about being back to work on Monday. If the Union didn't get in we would be working again."

Brister also testified that his supervisor was Bill Rabelais and that he had a conversation with him during the first week of December. This was in the office behind the mechanic shop and Johnny Chaney was also present. He stated that Rabelais went over a few things that Haynes had talked about, his experiences with unions, and that he would not have anything to do with unions because they more or less gave him the shaft. During this meeting Brister stated Rabelais asked him if he had ever been affiliated with the Union. Brister told him he had when he was in Public Service. He stated that Rabelais repeated what Haynes had said and stated, "that they would close up, sell the dock equipment, trucks, and move back to Baton Rouge," if the Union came in. Brister further stated that following the election he heard Bill Rebelais say that after this was over, the Respondent was going to find out the people that head voted for the Union and they would get rid of the people that had voted for the Union.

Employee Jerry Sterling testified that he attended a meeting in November 1983 where Sam Haynes spoke about the Union. He said the meeting took place in Hubble's office. He said that there were a number of other employees present and he named Ed Collins and Lionel Maxwell, but that there were no other supervisors present. He stated that "he introduced himself to the people that didn't know him. And he said the meeting was about the union, that there was no damn way a union was going to get in and tell him how to run his business."

In response to a question about how the Union got started, Haynes said "that a certain person or people employed got their feelings hurt when they took away the paid lunch hours." Sterling had a meeting with Rabelais around that same week, in which Rabelais, "just talked—basically the same thing that Mr. Haynes had said about companies closing up because of the union." He said that Rabelais told him, "I don't know how you feel about the union but I can tell you Mr. Haynes is not going to let no union in this company and tell him how to run it." In response to a question as to what would happen if the union came in, Sterling stated that Rabelais said "that Mr. Haynes would put a lock on the gate and we'd all be without jobs." He stated that Rabelais said that bulldog, Ed Collins, was for the union and that he was the only person that he knew was for the Union in the building. Sterling was asked if he ever had a conversation with Hubble about the Union and he said that during the last or middle part of November, Hubble asked him how he felt about the Union. He said that Hubble told him that he did not have to answer that, and stated that there is only one person in this whole company "that's admitted they'd vote for the union."

The Respondent denies that its supervisors and agents made statements as attributed to them by the General Counsel's witnesses and in support of that put on witnesses to contradict this testimony.

Hubble testified that at the meeting on December 13 he stated that he was talking about the conditions that the Union would get into the Company, and that he was referring to "them." At this point he told the men let's quit referring to "them" as we all know that Henry Michelle is the one organizing the Union. He said that he told the men that he knew Henry was the organizer, and they knew that he was the organizer, so get it out in the open. He stated that he told the men that he knew Michelle was the organizer and passed out the cards, and that it was important for everyone to realize and understand that Michelle did this as a personal vendetta against Hubble because of personal things that he had supposedly done to Michelle. He stated that he did not use any obscene, profane, or abusive language in talking about Michelle and that he made no threats. He stated that about five different employees came to him and informed him about Michelle and that at no time did he ask any employees how they were going to vote. He stated that in addition he knew that Michelle was responsible for the Union because each time he would go to him he would have a certain number of employees (two, three, or four men) gathered around him. When he approached they immediately broke up and disbanded.

John Chaney, a night-shop foreman for the Respondent, was called as a witness for the Respondent and asked if at any time before or afer the election did he ever hear Rabelais say that anybody that voted for the Union would be fired. He answered no. He was also asked, if he ever heard him threaten anybody about the Union, and if they were for or against the Union. He again answered no. He was asked if he ever heard him make any general statement to any group of people that union supporters would be fired. He answered no.

William L. Rabelais testified that at no time did he tell any of the employees that Haynes said he would close up if the Union came in. He testified that he informed the employees that he did not intend to be intimidated by the Teamsters Union, but that he did not threaten any of them with discharge. Nor did he ever tell them that if the Union got in they need not come to work on the following Monday.

Thus, the Respondent denies that it engaged in any of the conduct above and requested that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

Discussion and Conclusions

I have carefully evaluated the testimony of all of the witnesses in this proceeding. During the hearing I observed all the witnesses while they were testifying. I observed Henry Michelle, Edward Collins, and Charles Brister, employees of the Respondent who voted for the Union, and two of whom were discharged following the election. The Respondent argues that their testimony should not be credited because they are hostile employees, Michelle because he was mad at the Company over a job, and Collins and Brister because they had been discharged after the election. I have carefully evaluated all of the testimony and it is my conclusion that the testimony of the witness for the General Counsel, Henry Michelle, Edward Collins, Charles Brister, and Jerry Sterling, had a ring of truth and was straightforward, and that the testimony of the Respondent's witnesses did not have such a ring of truth. Therefore I credit their testimony over the general denials of the Respondent's supervisors.

Therefore it is my conclusion that the Respondent did threaten employees with discharge if the employees selected the Union as their bargaining representative; did create the impression of surveillance of the employees' union activities by informing the employees that the Respondent knew which employees were responsible for initiating the union organizing campaign, and did interrogate its employees regarding the employees' union sympathies and the sympathies of the employees' fellow employees. This conduct occurred prior to the election and during the critical period. It is further my conclusion that the General Counsel has sustained his burden in proving that the Respondent did engage in the conduct as alleged in Objection 2 to the election and that this conduct constitutes a sufficient basis for setting the election aside. Most certainly when considered with the additional conduct as alleged in the complaint the election must be set aside.

It is clear that employees were interrogated concerning their union activities. It is also clear that Respondent's entire course of conduct was intended to coerce and intimidate the employees into not voting for the Union. Thus, the Respondent's statements that they are aware of the employees that are pushing the Union, clearly conveys to the employees that their union activities are under surveillance and clearly create the impression of surveillance. Such conduct is clearly coercive and clearly intimidates the employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by Section 7. See Dutch Boy Inc., 262 NLRB 4 (1982). Moreover, the Respondent's threats of discharge, and the statements by the Respondent's representatives that the Respondent would close its doors and would move back to Baton Rouge before it allowed the Union to come in, clearly was intended to influence the employees' vote in the upcoming election. Under all the circumstances, it is my conclusion that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By coercively interrogating employees the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. By threatening its employees with discharge if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. By creating the impression of surveillance of its employees' union activities by informing its employees that the Respondent knew which employees were responsible for initiating the union organization campaign, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By creating the impression of surveillance of the employees' union activities by informing the employees that the Respondent knew which employees were responsible for initiating the union organizing campaign and by berating and disparaging an employee in the presence of other employees because of his union support and activity, the Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Inland Container Corporation and United Paperworkers International Union, AFL–CIO, Local No. 522. Case 17–CA–10772

8 February 1985

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION ON RECONSIDERATION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 13 September 1983 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in the above-entitled proceeding[1] finding that the Respondent did not, as alleged, violate Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On 4 November 1983 United Paperworkers International Union, AFL–CIO & CLC, Local No. 522 (the Union) filed a petition in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit seeking review of the Board's decision. Thereafter, on or about 20 August 1984 the Union filed a "Conditional Motion . . . For Leave To Adduce Additional Evidence." In response, the Board filed a motion on 12 September 1984 seeking an immediate remand of the case. On 17 September 1984 the court granted the Board's motion. In doing so the court specifically directed "that the NIRB report its decision on reconsideration to the court . . . ." The court also stated in its order that "[p]ending the NLRB's reconsideration and report to the court, in the interest of the complete and expeditious final disposition of this matter, the panel shall retain jurisdiction over the case."

The Board then invited the parties to file statements of position with respect to the issues raised on remand. The Respondent and the Union thereafter filed such statements with the Board.

The complaint in this case alleges, inter alia, that the Respondent, in staffing its newly acquired Kansas City, Kansas plant, unlawfully refused to consider for hire or to hire any of the predecessor employer's employees at that location because they were represented by the Union. In finding no merit to this allegation in its original decision, the Board relied on the credited testimony of the Respondent's vice president for employee relations staff services, David Harrison, and its employee relations supervisor, Janet Dudley, that the Respondent applied only the following three criteria in selecting employees for hire at the Kansas City plant: (1) a preference for high school graduates; (2) a preference for applicants who had 2 years or more of factory experience; and (3) an absolute prohibition against hiring any employee with previous boxmaking experience. Although the third criterion eliminated from consideration all the predecessor's employees, the Board adopted the administrative law judge's finding that it was justified by the Respondent's assertion of the "not inherently implausible" business consideration that it has experienced a considerable degree of success at other plants where it solely hired inexperienced production and maintenance employees. The Board ultimately dismissed the complaint based, inter alia, on this finding.

In its statement of position the Union argues that certain newly discovered evidence, when considered in conjunction with the preexisting record, now establishes that a motivating factor in the Respondent's decision not to hire its predecessor's employees was a desire on the Respondent's part to avoid recognizing and bargaining with the Union. The additional evidence the Union offers concerns a Federal district court proceeding[2] where Janet Dudley answered an interrogatory relating to the Respondent's hiring policies at the Kansas City facility. Dudley stated in writing there that the Respondent applied four rather than three criteria in selecting employees for the new operation: the three criteria set out above plus a preference for employees with "a demonstrated willingness to work in a nonunion environment." In addition, the Union seeks to introduce into evidence a manual the Respondent used in retraining its predecessor's supervisors before operations commenced. The Union claims that the manual demonstrates that such training related to methods of identifying and resisting union organizational activity.

The Respondent contends in its statement that the Union's motion to reopen the record should be denied on three grounds: (1) the proffered evidence is not newly discovered in that the Union failed to ask pertinent questions or to introduce documents which existed at the time of the hearing; (2) the evidence which the Union seeks to introduce bears only on the credibility of witnesses and thus cannot be considered under established Board and court precedent; and (3) this evidence, even if adduced and credited, would not require a different result since the alleged criterion involving a willingness to work in a nonunion plant would not apply to its predecessor's employees who had been excluded because they possessed boxmaking experience.

The Board, having duly considered the matter, concludes that the disposition of the issues raised here requires reopening the record and remanding the case for further hearing before the administrative law judge. However, we recommend limiting the proposed hearing to the taking of additional evidence concerning what impact Janet Dudley's answer to the interrogatory might have on this proceeding. While the Union also seeks to introduce into evidence the Respondent's training manual, this document clearly was in existence at the time of the original hearing and there is no showing that it was concealed from the Union. We therefore conclude that the training manual does not constitute newly discovered evidence under Section 102.48(d)(1) of the Board's Rules and Regulations and that further hearing on this point thus is unjustified.[3]

In making our report to the court, we specifically reject the Respondent's argument that Dudley's answer to the interrogatory does not also constitute newly discovered evidence. The record evidence in this case discloses that Dudley, when asked at the hearing how she went about securing the work force at the Kansas City location, testified that she simply applied the three criteria which the Board previously considered in deciding this case. Based on Dudley's precise testimony there, we cannot fault the Union for failing to adduce the alleged fourth criterion from Dudley as the Respondent would have it.

The Respondent further contends, as noted, that the record should not be reopened because the proffered evidence bears only on the credibility of witnesses. Although courts have held that "newly discovered evidence, the effect of which is merely to discredit, contradict or impeach a witness, does not afford a basis for the granting of new trial,"[4] the present case raises a substantial question whether a key witness or witnesses may have committed perjury in testifying regarding a material fact. No tribunal can disregard allegations of this kind.[5]

Finally, we also find no merit to the Respondent's contention that further hearing is unwarranted because the proffered evidence would not require the Board to reach a different result on the merits. Since the Board relied on the evidence of the Respondent's hiring criteria in its prior dismissal of the complaint, we conclude that in the circumstances here the Union should be afforded the opportunity to present additional evidence on this point.

In light of the above, the Board recommends to the District of Columbia Circuit Court that the disposition of the issues raised here requires reopening the record and remanding the case for further hearing before the judge for the purpose of taking additional evidence necessary to decide what impact, if any, Dudley's answer to the interrogatory should have on this proceeding.[6]

MEMBER DENNIS, dissenting.

Contrary to the majority, I do not believe that the court of appeals intended the Board to use the cumbersome and novel procedure of issuing a "report to the court."

The Board filed a motion with the court to remand this case because of newly discovered evidence bearing on the credibility of witnesses. The court issued an order that granted the Board's motion and remanded the record, thereby authorizing the Board to reopen the record and receive the evidence. See Section 10(e) of the Act.[1] The court, conscious of administrative delay, set a date certain for the Board to issue its decision and retained jurisdiction over the case "in the interest of the complete and expeditious final disposition of this matter." Consistent with our representations to the court and the terms of the court's order, including its emphasis on a speedy resolution of this proceeding, I would issue an order reopening the record and remanding the case to the judge who heard the testimony to consider the effect of the newly discovered evidence.[2]

[6] We believe there are issues in this case that can only be resolved after further hearing and we do not believe in the unique circumstances present here that the Board has authority to remand this case without the court's prior approval. The Board in its motion to the court specifically requested "an immediate remand of this case . . . so that the Board may regain jurisdiction to reopen the record . . . ." In granting the Board's motion, however, the court directed that "[p]ending the NLRB's reconsideration and report to the court . . . the panel shall retain jurisdiction over the case." Thus, based on our reading of this directive, we find that the Board is precluded from directly remanding this case to the judge. Rather, we conclude that the Board, in accordance with the court's order, must issue this "Report" by a date certain for the court's consideration setting out recommendations on the issues raised in the conditional motion for leave to adduce additional evidence.

[1] Indeed, the Board's motion explicitly requested "an immediate remand of this case to the Board pursuant to Section 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. 160(e), so that the Board may regain jurisdiction to reopen the record and reconsider its decision in light of the evidence now tendered by the Union."

[2] I would also leave the issue of the admissibility of the training manual initially to the judge.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

Upon a charge filed by the Union 3 November 1983[1] and amended 29 December, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint 30 December, amended 6 July 1984, against BDJ Contracting Co., Inc.; BDJ Contracting Co., Inc., Debtor-in-Possession; and Dynasty Fashions; collectively the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. Although properly served copies of the charge, amended charge, complaint, and amended complaint, the Respondent has failed to file an answer.

On 20 August 1984 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 28 August 1984 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Company filed no response. The allegations in the motion are therefore undisputed.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 10 days from service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 10 days of service, "all of the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board." Further, the undisputed allegations in the memorandum supporting the Motion for Summary Judgment state that the General Counsel sent a mailgram to the Respondent 8 February 1984 advising that failure to file an answer to the complaint by 14 February 1984 would result in a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 1 August 1984 the General Counsel sent another mailgram to the Respondent stating that its failure to file an answer to the amended complaint by 3 August 1984 would result in a Motion for Summary Judgment.

In the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely answer, to the complaint or the amended complaint, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.[2]

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent BDJ Contracting Co., Inc. (BDJ) has been engaged as a sewing contractor for clothing manufacturers at its facility in Hoboken, New Jersey. During the 12-month period ending 6 July 1984, Respondent BDJ, in the course and conduct of its business operations, provided services valued in excess of $50,000 for Gwen Sportswear, a corporation with an office and place of business in North Bergen, New Jersey, which, during the same period, purchased goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State. We find that Respondent BDJ is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Since about 22 July, Modestine Ward, Bianca Abrego, and Maria Aristud have been partners doing business as Dynasty Fashions (Dynasty) with an office and place of business at Respondent BDJ's Hoboken, New Jersey facility. Dynasty has been engaged as a sewing contractor for clothing manufacturers. Based on a projection of its operations, since about 22 July, the date Dynasty commenced its operations, Respondent Dynasty, in the course and conduct of its business operations, will annually perform services valued in excess of $50,000 directly for Gwen Sportswear. We find that Respondent Dynasty is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Since about 12 September, Respondent BDJ Contracting Co., Inc., Debtor-in-Possession, has been duly designated by the United States Bankruptcy Court, District of New Jersey, as the debtor-in-possession, of Respondent BDJ and Dynasty with full authority to continue operations and exercise all powers necessary to the administration of the business of Respondents BDJ and Dynasty, and has been a successor in bankruptcy to Respondents BDJ and Dynasty at all material times. Since 12 September Respondent BDJ, Debtor-in-Possession, with an office and place of business at [2] In granting the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, Chairman Dotson specifically relies on the total failure of the Respondent to respond to the allegations of the General Counsel's complaint and amended complaint. Thus, the Chairman regards this proceeding as being essentially a default judgment which is without precedential value.

Respondent BDJ's Hoboken, New Jersey facility, has been engaged as a sewing contractor for clothing manufacturers. Based on a projection of its operations since about 12 September, Respondent BDJ, Debtor-in-Possession, in the course and conduct of its business operations, will annually perform services valued in excess of $50,000 directly for Gwen Sportswear. We find that Respondent BDJ, Debtor-in-Possession, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

We find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Alter Ego Relationship and the Successor Relationship

On 25 July Respondent BDJ established Respondent Dynasty as a subordinate instrument and disguised continuation of BDJ. BDJ, Dynasty, and BDJ, Debtor-in-Possession, have been affiliated business enterprises with common ownership, management, operators, and supervision. They have formulated and administered a common labor relations policy affecting the employees of those enterprises, and they have shared common premises and facilities. They have employed substantially the same employees and have held themselves out to the public as a single integrated business enterprise.

Based on these facts, we find that BDJ, Dynasty, and BDJ, Debtor-in-Possession, are alter egos and a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

On 22 July Respondent Dynasty leased equipment and purchased assets from Respondent BDJ. Since that date Dynasty has been engaged in the same business operations at the same location, and has sold the same services or products to substantially the same customers as BDJ. In addition, Dynasty has as a majority of its employees individuals who were previously employed by BDJ in the unit set forth below.

Based on these facts, we find that Respondent Dynasty and Respondent BDJ, Debtor-in-Possession, is a continuing employing entity of and a successor to Respondent BDJ.

B. The Unit and the Union's Representative Status

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All of the employees employed by the Employer or all Contractors employed by the Employer in any and all capacities including, but not limited to cutters, markers, operators, pressers, carters, and/or shippers of garments, office or clerical workers, miscellaneous or auxiliary workers, but excluding executives, supervisors, managers, and guards within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act.

The Respondent has recognized the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit. Such recognition has been embodied in collective-bargaining agreements between the Respondent and the Union, the most recent of which was effective for the period 16 October 1981 to 15 October 1984.

C. The 8(a)(5) and (1) Violation

Since about May 1983 the Respondent has failed to comply with the provisions of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, including the provisions regarding wages, vacations, holiday pay, union security, checkoff, and welfare funds. On 22 July the Respondent withdrew recognition of the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit described above. About 28 July the Union requested, by letter, information relating to the alleged transfer of business between Respondents BDJ and Dynasty, as well as the Respondent's books and records for purposes of an audit. Since that date, the Respondent has refused to furnish this information, which is necessary for and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent, by this conduct, has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

D. The Independent 8(a)(1) Violation

About 25 July the Respondent's owner William DiResta and a supervisor and agent of the Respondent, and Modestine Ward, also a supervisor and agent, interrogated employees about their union membership, activities, and sympathies. We find the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by this conduct.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By failing and refusing to comply with the provisions of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union since May 1983, by withdrawing recognition of the Union on and after 22 July 1983, and by refusing to furnish the Union with relevant and necessary information it had requested 28 July 1983, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By interrogating its employees regarding their union membership, activities, and sympathies on 25 July 1983, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union, and failed and refused to comply with the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement, we shall order the Respondent to recognize and bargain on request with the Union, and to give effect to the terms of the agreement. We shall further order the Respondent to comply with the dues-checkoff provision of the contract and remit to the Union the dues due and owing for each employee who executed a dues-deduction authorization, with interest computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). We shall further order the Respondent to make whole unit employees for any loss of wages or other benefits caused by its failure to adhere to the terms of the contract until 12 September 1983,[3] including making the required payments to the welfare funds.[4] The Respondent shall also reimburse its employees for any expenses ensuing from the Respondent's unlawful failure to make payments to the welfare funds, as set forth in Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981). Backpay shall be made in a manner consistent with Board policy as stated in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., supra.

Having also found that the Respondent unlawfully failed and refused to furnish the Union with the relevant and necessary information it requested 28 July 1983, we shall order the Respondent to furnish such information to the Union on request.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, BDJ Contracting Co., Inc., BDJ Contracting Co., Inc.; Debtor-in-Possession; Modestine Ward, Bianca Abrego, and Maria Aristud, d/b/a Dynasty Fashions, Hoboken, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Withdrawing recognition from and refusing to bargain with Local 169, Amalgamated Clothing & Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO, CLC as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(b) Failing and refusing to adhere to the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union until 12 September 1983, including the terms relating to wages, vacations, holiday pay, union security, checkoff, and welfare funds.

(c) Coercively interrogating any employee about union support or union activities.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit on terms and conditions of employment:

> All of the employees employed by the Employer or all Contractors employed by the Employer in any and all capacities including, but not limited to cutters, markers, operators, pressers, carters, and/or shippers of garments, office or clerical workers, miscellaneous or auxiliary workers, but excluding executives,

[3] Consistent with the Supreme Court's recent opinion in NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 104 S.Ct. 1188 (1984), our remedy extends only to 12 September 1983, the date the Respondent filed its Chapter 11 bankruptcy petition. Bildisco held, in relevant part, that an employer does not violate Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by changing the terms and conditions of a collective-bargaining agreement during the period between the filing of a bankruptcy petition and the bankruptcy court's determination whether the collective-bargaining agreement may be rejected.

Member Hunter, for the reasons fully set forth in Edward Cooper Painting, 273 NLRB 224, issued today, disagrees with terminating the remedy as of 12 September 1983, the date the Respondent filed its bankruptcy petition, because all of the violations found preceded the filing of the petition.

We are mindful that the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, enacted by Congress 10 July 1984, modifies Bildisco and governs a debtor-in-possession's rejection of a collective-bargaining agreement. The statute does not apply, however, to cases such as this where the bankruptcy petition was filed prior to its enactment. Pub. L. 98-353 § 541, 98 Stat. 333, 390–391 (1984).

[4] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide for the addition of a fixed rate of interest on ulawfully withheld fund payments at the adjudicatory stage of a proceeding. We leave to the compliance stage the question whether the Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the benefit funds in order to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. Depending on the circumstances of each case, these additional amounts may be determined by reference to provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, by evidence of any losses directly attributable to the unlawful withholding, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

supervisors, managers, and guards within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act.

(b) Adhere to the terms and conditions of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union until 12 September 1983, including its provisions regarding wages, vacations, holiday pay, union security, checkoff, and welfare funds.

(c) Make whole unit employees for any loss of wages or other benefits suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to abide by the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(d) Reimburse the Union for all membership dues that the Respondent has failed to withhold and transmit to the Union pursuant to signed dues-deduction authorizations and in accordance with the checkoff provision of the collective-bargaining agreement, with interest, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(e) Furnish the Union with the information it requested by letter 28 July 1983 regarding the alleged transfer of business between Respondent BDJ and Respondent Dynasty, as well as the Respondent's books and records for purposes of an audit.

(f) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(g) Post at its facility in Hoboken, New Jersey, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted By Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 14 May 1982 Administrative Law Judge Walter J. Alprin issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.[1] The General Counsel filed cross-exceptions to the judge's decision and a brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The issue presented in this case is whether the parties had reached a meeting of the minds on the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement. The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to execute an agreed-upon contract. We disagree with his finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to execute the draft since we hold there was no agreement on the terms of the proposed contract.

The essential facts are as follows: Representatives from the newly certified Union and the Respondent met at 10 bargaining sessions between 12 March and 23 September 1980 and agreed on numerous items by initialing them. At the first session the Union advised that its practice was to have the employees vote to ratify any contract. It was also agreed that noneconomic issues would first be negotiated before economic items, and that there would be no complete contract until final agreement was reached on all items.

After the parties could not agree on a number of items at the 21 July 1980 meeting, the Union's local representative Ed Toff contacted the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service for assistance. After the second meeting with the Federal mediator on 17 September 1980 the mediator told the Union that Interprint was not going to move from its last offer. The Union on 23 September 1980 held a vote to decide whether to accept the Company's final proposal. Toff called J. P. Jones, attorney for Interprint, and told him that the employees had ratified the contract. Toff testified Jones said, "Oh, okay." Toff said he would draw up a contract and mail it for Jones' signature. Toff testified Jones responded, "Fine." Toff prepared the final contract using articles initialed by both sides, his own notes of issues agreed to during negotiations, and Interprint's proposals which had not been agreed to by the Union during negotiating sessions. Three copies of the contract were mailed to Jones on 5 November 1980 with a cover letter asking Jones to approve and sign the contracts. After more than 2 months, on 20 January 1981, the Union sent a followup letter. Jones responded 29 January 1981 saying the Employer had some doubt as to whether a collective-bargaining agreement had ever been reached.

The judge found that there was a meeting of the minds once the Union accepted the Employer's proposals regarding not previously agreed-upon items and therefore the resulting contract, albeit inartistically and inaccurately drawn, was binding on both parties. We find, contrary to the judge, that this is not a case in which the parties had a meeting of the minds that is not reflected in the proffered draft merely because it was inartistically or inaccurately drawn. Instead, it is clear that the parties here failed to discuss, much less agree to, certain important clauses in the draft and that certain other clauses, allegedly agreed on, were omitted or altered by the Union.

First, there were no commencement and termination dates in the draft proposal. These had been left blank. The judge takes care of this inadvertence by noting that "generally" the effective date of a contract is the date on which the offer is accepted which would be the date that the Union agreed to the proposed contract on 23 September 1980. Aside from begging the question, this sort of analysis, whether or not it is reasonable, is no substitute for an express agreement of the parties. See Mercedes-Benz, 258 NLRB 803 (1981).

In fact, Toff admitted at the hearing that at no time during the negotiations did the parties discuss or agree to a commencement date for the contract. The Board will not write a contract for the parties on the basis of what is "generally" done in these circumstances.

Second, there were several clauses that were omitted or altered by the Union in its proffered draft to make the draft more acceptable to the Union. For example, Interprint's proposal in article 19 dealing with transfer of equipment stated:

> The Company agrees that it will not transfer equipment to any other plant or location when

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] In the first paragraph of sec. D of the judge's decision the date 24 November should read 24 September.

> such equipment transfer will result in the lay off of bargaining unit employees. This section shall in no way be construed to prevent the sale of equipment even if such sale results in lay offs, but in such event, the rights of the employees will be determined under the seniority provisions of this Agreement.

The altered version submitted to Interprint, as written by Toff, said:

> The Company agrees that it will not transfer equipment to any other plant or location when such equipment transfer will result in the lay off of bargaining unit employees. This section shall, in no way, be construed to prevent the sale of equipment, except to a plant or subsidiary company of Interprint or A.U.S. (Associated Utilities Service).

Toff's explanation for changing the provision was, "I wrote that in there because I thought the language would be acceptable to me if we inserted that. And it ended up getting into the final contract when it was typed because it was on there. It really doesn't belong in the final contract; it should be taken out of there." The willingness of the Union, at the hearing, to concede that certain clauses should have been included in the contract or retained in their original form does not convince us that there has been a meeting of the minds on 23 September 1980.

Third, although the judge acknowleged that the Board may not force the parties to agree to any terms or to make concessions, he proceeded to go through the "final contract" adding terms which he surmised the parties would have agreed to, adding terms that the Union had decided to leave out, and correcting certain clauses which the Union had modified to suit its purpose. For example, article 15 of the contract on new machinery and processes differs from the handwritten notes of what was agreed to in that it left out language which takes certain manning requirements decisions from Interprint and makes them subject to binding arbitration. Toff explained this inconsistency by his own inadvertence since he did not have a copy of the agreed provision when he made up the contract. The judge found that the Union has admitted its error in omitting this clause and "the addition can be made." The judge also found that the Respondent's proposal on the International Union responsibility clause was inadvertently left out and it, too, should be added.

Other evidence which compels the conclusion that the parties never reached a final collective-bargaining agreement which could be executed is obvious in examining article 11 of the contract involving holidays. The judge found there was no agreement on the Union's extensive proposal on holidays but there was discussion resulting in Interprint agreeing "to the Union's counterproposal of 1/2 additional day before Christmas and New Years for a total of 9 holidays" and in the third year of the contract for an "additional holiday, either the day after Thanksgiving or Martin Luther King's birthday." The purported contract used the specific language of the Union's original proposal with, in addition, an effective date of 1 July 1980 without mention of the additional half days and effective 1 July 1982 the addition of a tenth day not including an alternate choice of Martin Luther King's birthday or the day after Thanksgiving. The judge resolves the discrepancies by saying, "The intent of the Holidays Clause is clear, and the language can be altered to conform." A review of the record shows the intent is not clear. Toff testified he could not recall if the parties ever discussed the specific holiday language at any time during the negotiations. The United States Supreme Court held in H. J. Heinz Co. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 514, 526 (1941), that, on request by an exclusive collective-bargaining representative, it is only a written contract embodying agreed terms which the Board may require the company to sign. The judge himself admits that the Company had not agreed to the specific wording of the Union's original extensive proposal on holidays which is incorporated in the purported agreement. The Company's counterproposal of 15 July 1980 shows that it "agreed" to the Union's counterproposal of additional half days for a total of nine holidays and the addition of a 10th day in the third year. The Company's notes, however, do not suggest that it "agreed" to the specific language of the holidays clause as written by the Union.

Finally, the judge found at a meeting on 18 April 1980 Interprint provided a list of proposals including a zipper clause. The parties discussed the clause, which provided that the contract contained the entire agreement. Interprint's demand for the clause was never withdrawn. The zipper clause was not included in the contract. It was not specified to the mediator as being one of the items still being open. The judge found, however, that in acceding to all open items on 23 September 1980 the Union had agreed to the insistence of Interprint that this clause be inserted.

In our view the judge has written the contract for the parties. This is contrary to the Board's remedial powers as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court in H. K. Porter Co. v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99 (1970). The Court there held that neither the company nor the union can be bound by a collective-bargaining provision to which it did not agree.

As the Supreme Court held in NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 401–402 (1952):

> . . . The National Labor Relations Act is designed to promote industrial peace by encouraging the making of voluntary agreements governing relations between unions and employers. The Act does not compel any agreement whatsoever between employees and employers. Nor does the Act regulate the substantive terms governing wages, hours and working conditions which are incorporated in an agreement. The theory of the Act is that the making of voluntary labor agreements is encouraged by protecting employees' rights to organize for collective bargaining and by imposing on labor and management the mutual obligation to bargain collectively. [Footnotes omitted.]

In this case the judge went too far in drafting the agreement for the parties. The record clearly shows that there was no meeting of the minds on many contractual issues, and therefore the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when it refused to execute the purported agreement.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER DENNIS, concurring in the result.

Because the parties never agreed on significant contract terms, i.e., commencement and termination dates, I find that there was no "agreement" within the meaning of Section 8(d) that the Respondent was obligated to assist in reducing to writing. Accordingly, the Respondent's refusal to execute the collective-bargaining agreement that the Union submitted did not violate Section 8(a)(5). See Luther Manor Nursing Home, 270 NLRB 949 fn. 1 (1984); Mercedes-Benz, 258 NLRB 803 (1981). It is, therefore, unnecessary to discuss the separate issue of the extent to which the Union's draft contract deviated from the proposals the parties agreed to during negotiations.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER J. ALPRIN, Administrative Law Judge. The primary issue in this matter is whether Respondent refused to engage in collective bargaining in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act by failing since November 5, 1980[1] to execute a collective-bargaining agreement allegedly reached about September 23. The charge was filed March 4, 1981, and the complaint issued April 17, 1981. The case was tried at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on December 14 and 15, 1981, and briefs were later submitted by Respondent and the General Counsel.[2]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent (Interprint) is a Pennsylvania corporation engaged in the business of printing at Trevose, Pennsylvania. It admits, and I hereby find, that it sold and shipped goods valued in excess of $50,000 in interstate commerce during the past year, and that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Graphic Arts International Union (the Union) constitutes a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE NEGOTIATIONS

The Union was certified on February 19 as collective-bargaining representative of

> All lithographic production employees, including employees engaged in camera, stripping, platemaking, and printing press operations, but excluding all other employees, including office clericals, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Between March 12 and September 23 there were 10 bargaining sessions, during which articles agreed upon were initialed on behalf of the Union by Robert J. Finnegan or Edward J. Toff, and on behalf of Interprint by Attorney J. P. Jones. At the first session the Union advised that, although not required by its constitution or bylaws, its practice was to have the employees vote to ratify any contract and that the employees had the final say on whether or not a contract was accepted. It was agreed that as far as possible the parties would first negotiate noneconomic issues before moving to economic issues, and that there would be no complete contract until final agreement was reached on all items.

Various articles were agreed or disagreed to during the negotiations. On July 15, Interprint offered its second counterproposal. At that meeting it agreed that whatever final wage increases were negotiated would be made retroactive to July 1. Its offer at the time was an increase of 25 cents per hour the first year of the contract, 30 cents the second year, and 35 cents the third year. The Union contacted the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service to ask assistance, and two meetings, one on August 1 with both parties, and one on September 17 with the parties separately, were held with a Federal mediator. At the first meeting the mediator asked which issues were open, and was told they were union shop, checkoff, struck work, chain shop, management security, no transfer of equipment, individual rights of the employees, foreign work, agreement continuity, international responsibility, strikes, lock out, grievances, wages, cost of living, night shift, hours of work, overtime, complement of help, layoff, discharge, apprentices, health and welfare, supplemental disability, delinquent liability, and sick and bereavement days. After the last separate meeting on September 17, the mediator told the Union that Interprint was not going to move from its last offer. The Union then, on September 23, held a meeting of bargaining unit employees, and the employees were given an opportunity to vote. There is a testimonial difference as to the information presented to the voters, with Union Representative Toff testifying that "we presented the contract as it was proposed by the Company, you know, their final proposals to the people." Charles Butler, Respondent's sole witness, had been a member of the bargaining unit but later became a higher paid supervisory employee. Butler testified that the specific proposals were not presented. In any event, the bargaining unit voted to accept what they understood to be Interprint's last offer.

Either that night or the next morning, Toff phoned Interprint's attorney, Jones, and informed him that the employees had ratified the agreement, the response to which was "Oh, okay." Toff said that he would put the contract together and mail it out for signature, to which Jones' response was "Fine." Toff then prepared the final contract[3] using articles initialed by both sides, his own notes of issues agreed to, and Interprint's proposals not agreed to by the union during the negotiating sessions. Because of other matters, it took until November 5 to prepare the contract, when it was mailed to Jones, with the following covering letter:

> Enclosed are three contracts for Interprint. Please look them over and if they are correct have them signed by the proper person and return all three copies for signatures, after which a copy will be returned to you.

After more than 2 months with no response, on January 20, 1981, the Union sent a followup letter. Nine days later, Attorney Jones answered as follows:

> It appears as if we have some valid questions concerning whether or not a collective bargaining Agreement was ever reached.
> We are in the process of reviewing this with our client and will be in touch with you shortly regarding our position on it.

The Union responded 6 days later, on February 4, 1981, stating

> It is the position of Local 14L that a collective bargaining agreement was reached and ratified by the employees of Interprint, and if we do not receive the signed agreements shortly, we will have to pursue the legal means available to us.

There were no further communications from Interprint, and 1 month later the Union filed its charge.

III. AREAS OF DISPUTE

Many of the provisions of the contract had been initialed by both parties and others have never been contested. The following are all of the contract provisions disputed by Interprint as having been not agreed to, having been left out of the contract, or having been included in the contract in altered form.

1. Effective Date and Termination Date: Article 1 of the Contract states:

> This agreement executed and effective as of the lst day of July, 1980 . . . .

Article 33 states:

> This contract shall be effective on the 1st day of July, 1980 and shall terminate on the 30th day of June, 1983.

Effective and termination dates in draft proposals were all left blank. Toff explained that he utilized the agreed dates of wage increases, found in the undisputed Article 7, entitled "Wages," which states:

> Effective July 1, 1981, a thirty cents (30¢) per hour increase for each employee.
> Effective July 1, 1982, a thirty-five cents (35¢) per hour increase for each employee.

2. International Union Responsibility: The Union's proposal was as follows:

> This agreement is subject to the approval of the International President. Such approval does not, however, under any circumstances, make the International responsible for the observance of this contract, or any breach thereof.

The entire provision was left out of the contract and Toff testified:

> I left it out . . . I left it out inadvertently because I just didn't think that the International would sign this contract anyway, and it's out of the final document; but it should be in.

3. New Machinery and Processes: As article 15 of the contract, this provision differs from the handwritten notes (G.C. Exh. 29) of what actually was agreed to in that it took certain manning requirement decisions from Interprint and made them subject to binding arbitration. Toff testified that this was a matter of inadvertence on his part, occasioned by not having a copy of the agreed provision when he made up the contract.

4. Picket Lines: The provision to which the parties agreed (G.C. Exh. 23) had a handwritten insert of the word "primary," so that a clause referred to "any primary lawful authorized picket line." The word "primary" was not included in article 18 of the contract.

[3] It is understood that the issue in the proceeding is whether the document actually was a contract, but for ease of reference it will be referred to herein as a "contract."

5. Seniority: This union proposal (G.C. Exh. 19) consisted of three single-spaced typed pages of material. Various changes proposed by Respondent (G.C. Exh. 43) primarily related to apprenticeship matters were all included in article 13 of the contract, but for one. One of the six grounds by which employees would cease to hold seniority was originally stated:

> d. Failure to report for work when recalled during a layoff within seven (7) working days, except in case of illness.

During negotiation the words "during a layoff within seven (7) working days" were stricken through, and a clause added: "Provided at least seven days notice is given." (R. Exh. 2, Art. 17, p. 2) This change did not appear in the final contract.

6. Transfer of Equipment: Interprint's proposal (G.C. Exh. 25) was:

> The Company agrees that it will not transfer equipment to any other plant or location when such equipment transfer will result in the layoff of bargaining unit employees. This section shall in no way be construed to prevent the sale of equipment even if such sale results in layoffs, but in such event, the rights of the employees will be determined under the seniority provisions of this agreement.

As article 19 of the contract, the words "except to a plant or subsidiary company of Interprint of A.U.S. (Associated Utilities Service)" were added after the words "sale of equipment." Further, the final clause of the original, from the words "but in such event," was left out.

The only explanation for the addition to the agreed provison was Toff's testimony that "I wrote that in there, because I thought that language would be acceptable to me if we inserted that. And it ended up getting into the final contract when it was typed because it was on there. It really doesn't belong in the final contract; it should be taken out of there. There is no explanation for dropping the final clause of the original provision."

7. Holidays: The Union made an extensive proposal (G.C. Exh. 41) covering two-thirds of a single-spaced typewritten page. There was no agreement on this clause, but there was discussion (G.C. Exh. 34, second page) resulting in Interprint's agreeing "to union's counterproposal of one-half additional day before Christmas and New Years, for total of nine holidays," and, in the third year of the contract, for "an additional holiday, either day after Thanksgiving or Martin Luther King's birthday."

Article 11 of the contract used the Union's original language, with, in addition, an effective date of July 1, 1980, with no mention of additional one-half days, and with the addition of a 10th day, not including the alternative choice of Martin Luther King's birthday, after July 1, 1982.

8. Entire Agreement Clause: At the meeting of April 18, Interprint provided a list of proposals which included a provision that the contract contained the entire agreement between the parties, a so-called zipper clause. The parties discussed the clause, and the demand for it was never withdrawn. However, the clause did not appear in the final form of the contract.

IV. SECOND VOTE

Respondent's sole witness, Butler, was the shop steward during the negotiations. He testified that on November 24, the morning after the vote had been taken, he was approached by three bargaining unit members who felt they had voted too quickly. Butler decided to hold a meeting that afternoon for another vote, and gave oral notice to the unit members but no notice to the Union. Butler testified at one point that the vote was on the contract, and at another point that it was whether or not to retain the union. Under questioning by the Administrative Law Judge he testified it was "a vote as to whether we wanted to accept 90 cents over 3 years or just forget the union, period." After the second vote, Butler phoned Toff, and told him that the employees "had changed their mind about the previous vote that we had the night before."

V. DISCUSSION

Section 8(a)(5) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to "refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees." Section 8(d) of the Act requires "the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party." It has long been settled that in implementing these statutory provisions "the Board may not, either directly or indirectly, compel concessions or otherwise sit in judgment upon the substantive terms of collective-bargaining agreements."[4] On the other hand, the Board has authority to order the signing of a contract to which the parties have agreed.[5] The central issue in this matter is whether there was a meeting of the minds among the parties to the collective bargaining.

When the Federal mediator was called in, he was told of all the open items to the negotiations. When he reported that Respondent would not change its position, the Union surrendered and accepted all of the Employer's proposals. On being told this on September 23 Respondent raised no objection and agreed that the Union would collect the various clauses into a hard copy of the contract. Throughout the period from late September to early November, while this was being done, Respondent never took the position that the agreement was less than complete.

Respondent then held the contract without comment from about November 5 until January 29, 1981. Then, in answer to a followup letter from the Union, it raised for the first time the issue of "whether or not a collective-bargaining agreement was ever reached." Though promising that it would be "in touch with you shortly regarding our position," Respondent did not contact the Union prior to the charge being filed a month later on March 4, 1981, after the charge was filed, or after the complaint was issued.

In its answer of April 28, 1981, to the complaint herein, Respondent denied that the particular employees constituted an appropriate bargaining unit, denied that the Union was the exclusive bargaining agent of the specified employees, denied that it had recognized the Union, denied it had engaged in negotiations with the Union, and denied that it had been requested to execute a written contract, in addition of course to denying that it had reached a full agreement with the Union. It also raised an affirmative defense laches. At no time prior to the hearing, some 15 months after it received the contracts from the Union with the invitation to "look them over," did the Respondent specify any alleged differences between the contract it received and what had been agreed to after 6 months of collective bargaining.

The parties participated in a mediation designed to cover all open items of disagreement. The Union capitulated and accepted Respondent's position on all such items. Respondent tacitly agreed from September 23, 1980, until January 29, 1981, that an agreement had been reached, and never particularized any argument that agreement had not been reached until the hearing herein. On all the evidence it is clear that the parties did in fact reach an agreement through collective bargaining.

Though there was a meeting of the minds, the resulting hard copy contract was inartistically or inaccurately drawn. However, it has been said that:

> The purpose of the Act is to achieve industrial stability by encouraging the processes of collective bargaining and the execution of agreed-upon bargaining contracts . . . . The mere fact that (to reflect the terms of the agreement as reached) required some additions or alterations in the agreement submitted does not relieve the parties of the obligation to execute the bargaining contract agreed to. See International Union of Operating Engineers Local 525, AFL-CIO (Clark Oil & Refining Corp.), 185 NLRB 609 (1970).[6]

The Union has admitted its error in failing to include Respondent's proposals regarding international union responsibility, and regarding new machinery and processes. The additions can be made. The single word left out of the clause relating to picket lines is easily inserted, as are the short portions left out of the seniority clause and the transfer of equipment clause. The intent of the holidays clause is clear, and the language can be altered to conform thereto.

The entire agreement clause, or "zipper clause," was not among those specified to the mediator as being open. However, it was a proposal made by Respondent and fully discussed by the Union, and was litigated by the Respondent during the hearing herein. In acceding to all open items on September 23, the Union also agreed to the continued insistence by Interprint that this clause be included in the written contract, and it must be inserted.

There remain for consideration the effective date and the period or termination date of the contract. Generally, the effective date of a contract is the date on which the offer is accepted, unless the agreed terms state otherwise. Here, agreement came with the Union's acceptance on September 23, and except for an agreed retroactivity applying solely to wage increases, there is no other expression of effective date. Therefore, the effective date is September 23.

The termination date is provided by the clear intent of the parties. "Even though the contract may not state in express terms that it is to endure for a definite period, the time mentioned therein may indicate that the parties intended that it shall continue for at least such period."[7] The parties understood that the principal point of the agreement was a wage increase of 90 cents over a 3-year period—25 cents the first, 30 cents the second, and 35 cents the third year. Even the "second vote", hereinafter referred to, was clearly as to this understanding. Thus, we have a contract agreement for a 3-year period measured from the first wage increase. The parties explicitly agreed that the wage provision would be retroactive to July 1, 1980, and the 3-year term intended will expire and the contract terminate on June 30, 1983.

Respondent argues that this case should be governed by the decision of the Board in Mercedes-Benz, Inc., 258 NLRB 803, (1981). In that case six prior contracts had been effective February, and when that date had passed in new contract negotiations a strike took place. The strike was settled a month later, after further negotiations which did not directly concern effective date. The Union erroneously testified the wage increases to have been retroactive, while the Employer correctly insisted that there was no such agreement. The Board found that under these circumstances there had not been a meeting of the minds between the parties, and that there was no contract. The facts of the matter at hand are different. This was the first contract negotiated between the Respondent and the recently certified Union. The parties specifically agreed to retroactivity on wage increases. There was no misunderstanding or disagreement as to an effective date, and the contract came into effect upon the Union's capitulation on all outstanding open issues. In this case there was no disagreement between the parties as would negate the formation of a contract when the offer was accepted.

Finally, the Respondent alleges that, by reason of the "second vote" described above, the Union failed to receive a proper ratification of the proposed contract. As pointed out by the Union, that "second vote" came after the proposed contract had already been accepted and at most could be a unilateral and ineffective act. Of greater importance, the so-called ratification was not necessary to the acceptance of the contract, and the vote was a purely internal union affair having no effect on the validity of the contract. CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

2. The Charging Party is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

3. All lithographic production employees, including employees engaged in camera, stripping, platemaking, and printing press operations but excluding all other employees, including office clericals, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act constitute a unit appropriate for bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material herein, the Union has been and continues to be the exclusive representative of the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing to execute the collective-bargaining contract agreed to by Respondent and the Union, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, it will be recommended that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

As I have found that Respondent violated its obligation under the Act by refusing to execute the agreement herein, I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered upon request to sign such an agreement, to comply retroactively with its terms, and to make whole the employees for losses, if any, which they may have suffered by Respondent's refusal to sign such an agreement, in accordance with the formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[8]

Edward Cooper Painting, Inc. and Cooper and Cooper Painting, an Alter Ego and International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades of the United States and Canada, Local 768, AFL–CIO. Case 9–CA–17245

12 February 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 29 December 1982 Administrative Law Judge James M. Fitzpatrick issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

As stated in the judge's decision, on 4 December 1981 Respondent Edward Cooper Painting, Inc. (Respondent Corporation) petitioned the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky for relief as a voluntary debtor in bankruptcy under Chapter 11, Title 11, of the United States Code. According to the undisputed representations of the Respondent in its brief in support of exceptions, the debtor-in-possession requested permission to reject under 11 U.S.C. § 365(d)(1) the collective-bargaining agreement entered into between the Union[2] and Respondent Corporation (as a member of the PDCA[3]) effective 1 April 1980 through 31 March 1982.[4] The Supreme Court recently held in NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco[5] that from the filing of a petition in bankruptcy until formal acceptance the collective-bargaining agreement is not an enforceable contract within the meaning of Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act and that a debtor-in-possession does not commit an unfair labor practice when it unilaterally rejects or modifies a collective-bargaining agreement before formal rejection is approved by the bankruptcy court.[6] The judge's recommended Order would require that Respondent Corporation abide by the terms of the then-existing collective-bargaining agreement from the date of its unlawful abrogation of the contract (1 August 1981) until the expiration of the agreement (31 March 1982). Consistent with the Supreme Court's opinion in Bildisco, we modify that recommended Order to require that Respondent Corporation enforce the terms and conditions of the applicable contract only until 4 December 1981, the date on which Respondent Corporation filed its petition for bankruptcy. In all other respects, the recommended Order[7] of the judge is adopted.[8]

Our dissenting colleague states that, because the violation found here preceded the date of the filing of the Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings, the Board should adopt the judge's remedy and provide for backpay under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement even into the period of the bankruptcy proceedings. From a practical standpoint, this has no bearing on the actual backpay sums owing by Respondent Corporation because it had ceased operations prior to filing for bankruptcy. However, although we agree with our colleague's observation that Bildisco stated nothing which questioned or disputed the Board's authority to adjudicate prepetition unfair labor practices, our remedy for the prepetition unfair labor practices we find here, limited so as not to affect Respondent Corporation's obligations under the bargaining agreement during the bankruptcy proceedings, accords proper consideration to the effect of Bildisco on this case. Our colleague expressly notes that the Court in Bildisco emphasized giving primacy to the policy underlying Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings to permit the successful rehabilitation of debtors, but nevertheless would impose on the debtor-in-possession the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement in this case, a result clearly inconsistent with this policy.[9] The contractual backpay remedy

[1] In the absence of exceptions, we accept the determination of the judge that following the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement on 31 March 1982 the Respondent was obligated to bargain in the single-employer unit alleged and found appropriate.

[3] The PDCA (Blue Grass Chapter of the Painting and Decorating Contractors of America) is an association of employers engaged in group collective bargaining of which Respondent Corporation was a member at all times material to the issues in this case.

[4] The record does not establish whether the bankruptcy court has granted Respondent Corporation permission to reject the contract.

[6] We are mindful that the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984 Congress enacted 10 July 1984 modifies Bildisco and governs a debtor-in-possession's rejection of a collective-bargaining agreement. The statute does not apply, however, to cases such as the instant one in which the bankruptcy petition was filed prior to its enactment. Pub. L. 98–353, § 541, 98 Stat. 333, 390–391 (1984).

[7] In adopting the judge's recommended remedy as revised to reflect our decision herein, we shall also revise the remedy to include that payments be made to the employees' vacation fund.

[8] The record reveals that on 17 May 1982 Edward Cooper as an individual filed a petition for relief as a voluntary debtor in bankruptcy under Chapter 7, Title 11, of the United States Code. There is no evidence that Respondent Partnership, Cooper and Cooper Painting, has been brought within the jurisdiction of either of the bankruptcy proceedings referred to in this Decision and Order. Thus, we adopt the recommended Order of the judge as it applies to Respondent Partnership.

[9] Our dissenting colleague would impose the terms of a bargaining agreement on a respondent in bankruptcy who repudiated the agreement just prior to filing for bankruptcy, but would not impose such terms on a respondent who repudiated the agreement just after filing. Our colleague has not adequately explained how the successful rehabilitation of debtors is accorded paramount weight in the former setting as well as the latter.

we here award fully restores the status quo prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition. The validity of the contract's repudiation during the term of the bankruptcy and the issue of whether any additional sums are owed employees under the repudiated agreement are matters for the bankruptcy court to decide under bankruptcy law, and the Board's remedy here does not foreclose their consideration in that forum.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Edward Cooper Painting, Inc. and Cooper and Cooper Painting, an alter ego, Lexington, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b).

"(b) Give effect to the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement entered into between the Respondent and the Union in 1978 for the period 1 April 1978 through 31 March 1980 and as amended 1 April 1980 except that Respondent Corporation's liability under this provision shall terminate as of 4 December 1981, the date on which the Corporation filed its petition for bankruptcy."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(c).

"(c) Reimburse all employees in the bargaining unit, the funds established under the bargaining agreement (excluding the industry advancement fund), and the Union for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's abrogation of the collective-bargaining agreement from and after 1 August 1981, with interest, in the manner prescribed in the section of this decision entitled 'The Remedy,' except that Respondent Corporation's liability under this provision shall terminate as of 4 December 1981, the date on which the Corporation filed its petition for bankruptcy."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting in part.

Contrary to my colleagues, I find no basis in the Supreme Court's opinion in NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco[1] for terminating the Board's remedies as of the date of the filing of a bankruptcy petition where, as here, the adjudicated violations occurred prior to the filing of the petition.[2] My colleagues are proceeding on a false premise if they believe that the Board must give priority to the Federal bankruptcy statutes regardless of when the unfair labor practice occurred, i.e., even if it was before the filing of the bankruptcy petition. Thus, while Bildisco establishes some limitation on the Board's jurisdiction to adjudicate unfair labor practices which occur after the date of the bankruptcy petition,[3] it does not establish such a limit on the Board's authority to adjudicate or remedy prepetition unfair labor practices. In fact, the Supreme Court was conspicuously silent about the Board's authority to remedy prepetition unfair labor practices once a bankruptcy petition is filed. I am convinced this is so because the Board's remedy does not constitute an independent adjudication of an unfair labor practice.

In Bildisco, the Court held, inter alia, that a debtor-in-possession in a Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceeding does not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) by unilaterally rejecting or modifying a collective-bargaining agreement between the filing of the bankruptcy petition and formal rejection by the bankruptcy court. Giving primacy to the policy underlying Chapter 11 to permit successful rehabilitation of debtors, the Court concluded that "from the filing of a petition in bankruptcy until formal acceptance, the collective-bargaining agreement is not an enforceable contract within the meaning of NLRA [Section] 8(d)."[4] Once a petition in bankruptcy is filed, it is the bankruptcy court which has the exclusive authority to determine whether rejection of the collective-bargaining agreement should be permitted.[5] Moreover, rejection relates back to the date immediately preceding the filing of the petition, which means that "suit may not be brought against the debtor-in-possession under the collective-bargaining agreement; recovery may be had only through administration of the claim in bankruptcy."[6]

[2] I would adopt the judge's recommended Order with minor modifications. I agree with the revision of the judge's remedy specified at fn. 7 of the majority's decision to provide for payments to the employees' vacation fund. I further would revise par. 2(b) of the judge's recommended Order to clarify that the collective-bargaining agreement by which the Respondents are to abide is the agreement which was effective 1 April 1980 through 31 March 1982. In addition, I find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's discussion regarding multiemployer bargaining units because a single-employer unit was found appropriate here. Finally, with regard to the violations found against Respondent Partnership, I concur with my colleagues' adoption of the judge's make-whole remedy for the reasons stated herein.

[3] Because the violations found in this case occurred prior to the filing of the petition in bankrupicy, I find it unnecessary to reach the issue of the extent, if any, of the Board's jurisdiction to adjudicate postpetition allegations involving other types of conduct or other sections of the Act.

[5] The Court stated in this regard that, although the bankruptcy court must be persuaded before acting on a request to modify or reject a collective-bargaining agreement that "reasonable efforts to negotiate a voluntary modification have been made and are not likely to produce a prompt and satisfactory solution," the bankruptcy court does not have to determine whether the parties have bargained to impasse or committed any unfair labor practices since the filing of the petition. 104 S.Ct. at 1196–97.

I therefore agree with my colleagues that under Bildisco the critical date for determining whether a violation of the Act has occurred is the date the bankruptcy petition is filed. I note, however, that the Court in Bildisco stated nothing which questioned or disputed the Board's authority to adjudicate and/or remedy prepetition unfair labor practices. Thus, it is undisputed that the Board has the exclusive authority to determine whether alleged unfair labor practices have occurred prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition. If the Board is to adjudicate prepetition unfair labor practices—and if such an adjudication is to have any meaning—it follows that the Board should also be able to remedy them, with the understanding that the Board's remedy may be reviewed by the bankruptcy court as a creditor's claim.[7]

Further, the Supreme Court's opinion in Bildisco left undisturbed the Board's authority under Section 10(c) of the Act to require a person who has been found to have engaged in unfair labor practices to cease and desist therefrom and "to take such affirmative action including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of this Act." As the Supreme Court held in Nathanson v. NLRB,[8] the fixing of monetary remedies is an administrative function confided solely to the Board.[9] Moreover, the authority to modify or set aside a remedial order rests exclusively with the Board and the appropriate reviewing Federal courts.[10] The Board will, of course, take changed circumstances into consideration in subsequent compliance or contempt proceedings,[11] but it is the bankruptcy court which will examine the allowability of monetary claims resulting from Board orders and determine their relative priority to other creditors' claims.[12]

Accordingly, where, as here, the violations have occurred prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition, there is no reason—logical, statutory, or precedential—for the Board to cut off its normal remedial provisions as of the date of the petition. To the contrary, by cutting off the remedy as of the date of the bankruptcy petition, my colleagues are necessarily foreclosing the bankruptcy court from adjudicating the bankruptcy and determining the allowability and priority of the Board's monetary claims, and, most importantly here, whether to allow the voiding or modifying of the contract. Such usurpation of the bankruptcy court's authority is inconsistent with the Court's attempt in Bildisco to accommodate the competing policies of the NLRA and the Bankruptcy Code. I further submit that such action by the Board goes further than the Court's holding.

The majority, responding to my position, states that I have "not adequately explained how the successful rehabilitation of debtors is accorded paramount weight" if I would impose the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement on a respondent in bankruptcy who repudiated such contract before the filing of the bankruptcy petition, when I would not impose such a remedy on a respondent who repudiated the contract after the filing of the petition. First of all, the critical difference in the question, as posed by the majority, is that in the one case the respondent has committed an unfair labor practice and in the other case it has not; i.e., if a respondent has repudiated the contract prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition, it has committed a classic violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) which must be remedied accordingly. However, under Bildisco, if a respondent repudiates the contract after the filing of the petition, it does not commit an unfair labor practice. The Supreme Court so held without disturbing the Board's prepetition jurisdiction, thus making it clear that the policies underlying Chapter 11 should be accorded primacy over the NLRA only after the filing of the bankruptcy petition. My colleagues misunderstand Bildisco when they interpret it otherwise.

I further submit, contrary to the majority, that the traditional make-whole remedy which I favor for prepetition unfair labor practices does not in fact impose the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement on the debtor-in-possession. As I have indicated above, if a respondent is involved in Chapter 11 proceedings, then the Board's remedy becomes a creditor's claim like any other, i.e., it is a monetary claim which may or may not be allowed by the bankruptcy court.

Finally, the majority insists that by cutting off the remedy as of the date of the bankruptcy petition they do not, as I suggest, foreclose consideration by the bankruptcy court of issues relating to the appropriateness of rejection of the contract or to the determination of sums owed under the rejected contract. I remain convinced, however, that by cutting off the remedy as of the filing of the petition, the majority is effectively determining that the contract is properly rejected as of that date, i.e., before the bankruptcy court has had a chance to make that determination itself as it has the exclusive authority to do.[13]

[7] My colleagues do not dispute that the Board traditionally has imposed full remedies for prepetition unfair labor practices with no qualifications imposed because of subsequently filed bankruptcy proceedings.

Accordingly, in the instant case, because all of the violations found preceded the filing of the bankruptcy petition by Respondent Corporation on 4 December 1981, I dissent from the majority's failure to order a traditional make-whole remedy.

[13] I find it interesting that my colleagues have not accounted for the possibility that the bankruptcy court may dismiss the bankruptcy petition. Would they then allow the charging party to petition the Board for an extension of the remedy? That would seem consistent, however unpalatable, with their view.

EDWARD COOPER PAINTING, INC. AND COOPER AND COOPER PAINTING, AN ALTER EGO

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES M. FITZPATRICK, Administrative Law Judge. In this case a union painting contractor in financial distress attempts to escape collective-bargaining obligations by terminating the union contract, hiring nonunion employeees, changing from a corporate enterprise to a partnership, and seeking voluntary bankruptcy for the Corporation and himself personally. For the reasons set out below, I find that the Corporation and the Partnership committed unfair labor practices in not dealing with the Union and in terminating the employment of a union member.

This proceeding originated with unfair labor practice charges filed August 7, 1981,[1] (and amended August 11) by International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades of the United States and Canada, Local 768, AFL–CIO (the Union), against Edward Cooper Painting, Inc. (Respondent Corporation). A complaint based on the charges issued September 14 (and was amended July 13, 1982), alleging that the Corporation and its alter ego, a partnership named Cooper and Cooper Painting[2] (Respondent Partnership, and with the Corporation collectively referred to as Respondent), had committed unfair labor practices forbidden by Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The principal issues are (a) whether in late July Respondent constructively discharged David Young Jr. in violation of Section 8(a)(3), (b) whether as of August 1 Respondent unlawfully reneged on a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, (c) whether about the same time Respondent unlawfully withdrew from group bargaining with the Union, (d) whether subsequent to August 1 Respondent remained bound to the terms of the existing collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, (e) whether the next successive collective-bargaining agreement between the group and the Union, effective April 1, 1982, is binding on Respondent, and (f) whether Respondent's precarious financial condition justified abandonment of the collective-bargaining agreement, group bargaining, and recognition of the Union. The case was heard at Lexington, Kentucky, on July 13 and 14, 1982.

At the opening of the hearing Respondent sought a stay of these proceedings, contending the Board lacks jurisdiction because Respondent, as a debtor-in-possession under the bankruptcy laws, is a different entity from the prebankruptcy company, not party to any collective-bargaining agreements not affirmatively assumed, and in any case, subject to the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court rather than the Board. Respondent reiterated its contentions in its posthearing brief. Having reserved ruling on the motion, I now conclude that the Board has primary jurisdiction over questions of unfair labor practices, including questions involving parties before the bankruptcy courts, and that findings respecting unfair labor practice issues should not be deferred because a respondent in a Board proceeding is also a petitioner in the bankruptcy courts. Nathanson, Trustee v. NLRB, 344 U.S. 25, 29 (1952).

Based on the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs of the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Blue Grass Chapter of the Painting and Decorating Contractors of America (PDCA) is an organization of painting contractors engaged in group collective bargaining with the Union which represents their employees. Member employers of PDCA annually perform services valued in excess of $50,000 in States other than the State in which they are located.

Respondent Corporation, a Kentucky corporation, has maintained a place of business near Lexington, Kentucky, and has been engaged in the Lexington area as a painting contractor, particularly in commercial and industrial painting. Since its inception in late 1981 Respondent Partnership has similarly been engaged in business. At times material to the issues in this case, Respondent Corporation has been a member of PDCA. It is undisputed that Respondent Corporation and Respondent Partnership are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Union and Respondent

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. Prior to the hearing, as detailed hereinafter, it has represented employees of Respondent Corporation. One issue presented here is whether such representation continues and includes employees of Respondent Partnership. The General Counsel alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the following describes a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees engaged in painting employed by Respondent at and out of its Lexington, Kentucky facility, but excluding all office clerical employees, guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

A considerable number of years ago Edward Cooper as an individual began working as a journeyman painter employed at various times by B. L. Raden and Son, Inc. and Norvell and Blakeman, two of the three current members of PDCA. He was a member of the Union and at times served on the union negotiating committee in collective bargaining with PDCA. Around 1971, the exact time not being apparent in the record, he went into business for himself and at some point formed Respondent Corporation of which he is sole stockholder, president, and secretary and treasurer. The Corporation employed a small crew of painters, the number varying from a low of one to a high of seven and included his son William David Cooper who, by the time of the events involved here, functioned as working foreman of the crew. In this capacity the son held no corporate stock, had no access to corporate records, made no business decisions, and, like the other workmen, received an hourly wage, although at a higher rate. All decisions for the Corporation were made by Edward Cooper.

It is not clear precisely when Respondent began business nor when the Corporation was formed. The evidence indicates, and I find, that from the time Respondent entered into business until August 1, 1981, it operated as a union enterprise. In the early 1970s Edward Cooper individually signed a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union as an independent contractor (not through PDCA) and continued to be an independent signatory to subsequent union contracts until he joined PDCA around 1978. These agreements were his adoption of agreements negotiated between PDCA and the Union. The earliest Cooper agreement received into evidence, which covered the period April 1, 1975, through March 31, 1976, was the PDCA/union contract of that time signed individually by Edward Cooper. Cooper, apparently as an individual, joined PDCA in 1978 and as a member of that association participated in negotiations with the Union of the contract for the period April 1, 1978, through March 31, 1980. In the back of that contract "Edward Cooper" is listed as one of the contracting members of PDCA. He also participated in negotiating the next agreement covering the period April 1, 1980, through March 31, 1982. He did not participate in the negotiations which resulted in the current PDCA/union agreement covering the period April 3, 1982, through March 31, 1983.

B. The IBM Subcontracting Policy

International Business Machines (IBM) is one of the important customers of industrial painting contractors in the Lexington vicinity. Since 1971 or 1972 Respondent has relied heavily on maintenance contracts let by IBM. Historically, IBM's business policy respecting maintenance painting work had been to contract only with union contractors which included members of PDCA. In the latter part of May 1981 IBM announced a change in policy in that in the future it would invite bids for maintenance painting from both union and nonunion contractors. The effect of this change was immediate and traumatic for union contractors. Nonunion contractors underbid them and they no longer obtained the amount of work they had previously. The impact of the change on Respondent was even greater. As the smallest unionized industrial painting contractor in the area, Respondent experienced difficulty competing with the larger union contractors and frequently was in arrears in its financial obligations to the Union and the various recipient funds provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent Corporation borrowed heavily in order to meet these obligations and Edward Cooper mortgaged his home to obtain funds for that purpose. With the change in IBM policy, Respondent's business fell off drastically. As Edward Cooper testified, he was going broke.

C. Respondent's Efforts to Survive

When Respondent's drop in business reached the point in July when it was employing only one painter part time, Edward Cooper decided to change from a union to a nonunion operation. As he testified without contradiction, Respondent had difficulty competing with the larger contractors; the depressed state of the economy made it increasingly difficult to obtain contracts justifying a union wage scale; the Corporation's credit was exhausted; he had mortgaged his residence in order to meet the payroll and payments called for under the collective-bargaining agreement and, at times, was unable to draw pay for his own work. Interest rates on outstanding loans were so high that Respondent could pay only interest and could make no payments on principal. He testified he ultimately lost his home. By the first week of July his working crew was down to three painters which, I infer, included his son who was a working foreman, and they were working only irregularly. The last rank-and-file employee was Walter Young Jr., recording secretary of the Union, son of Union Business Representative Douglas Young, and an employee of Respondent since 1977. Young testified that work had dropped off in July, and that on July 23 and 24, his last days of work, he worked only 1-1/2 to 2 hours each day. On July 24 Edward Cooper took decisive action by writing the following letter to the Union:

> Business Representative
> Painters Local #768
> Mr. Doug Young
> 348 Peach Tree Road
> Lexington, Ky.
> Doug,
> Please be advised as of August 1, 1981 we wish to have our name removed as signatory to our agreement. This is to terminate our agreement.
> Through the years our relationship has been very harmonious. I deeply regret that circumstances have caused me to make this grave decision.
> Sincerely,
> Ed Cooper

The Union did not immediately learn of this letter because Young was away and did not return until the end of the month.

The practice in the trade had been for employers to call employees when they were needed for work on a job and for employees who were not called to call their employer to inquire if work was available. In the days following his last days of work, Walter Young Jr., having received no calls from the Coopers, called David Cooper on July 29 to ask for work at IBM. David told him he did not think he would have any work for quite a while. Young then asked if he was telling him he should find something else and David Cooper answered, "Yes." Later the same day Edward Cooper telephoned Walter Young at home, telling him he did not think he would be doing any more union work and was sorry about it, that if he had work at a later date, maybe Young could come back to work or do subcontracting or something. Young replied that, due to his position in the Union, as well as his father's, he did not think it was possible under any conditions. Cooper stated that he still had some union work but he did not know how he was going to do it or anything right then. According to him, he did honor these unspecified contracts which were entered into while the Company was operating under union conditions and did complete them under union conditions by paying employees union scale and making appropriate contributions to the union funds. According to him, some of this work under "union conditions" continued after August 1, but by about November 1 Respondent was no longer operating under union conditions on any work. Edward Cooper testified credibly and I find that through the last part of July Respondent had no work to perform. However, in early August Respondent obtained a time and materials contract from IBM.

After the telephone conversation between Edward Cooper and Walter Young Jr. at the end of July, Young did not again work for Respondent, nor did he seek to. The Coopers did not in so many words discharge Young. They simply did not have any work to offer him at the time and Edward Cooper indicated he would give him employment in the future if he had work. But he made it clear that Respondent no longer would operate as a unionized enterprise. With that condition, both understood that Young would not accept further employment with Respondent. As found hereinafter, Respondent continued to be legally bound to the collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent's indicated refusal to continue to employ Young under those assured conditions when work became available constituted a discharge in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Marquis Elevator Co., 217 NLRB 461 (1975).

As already noted, union officials first read Cooper's July 24 letter about July 30. A few days thereafter, I infer during the week of August 3, Cooper was seen working at IBM with employees who were not union members. Upon learning this, Business Representative Walter Young sent word to Edward Cooper to meet him at a service station near IBM. When they met, Young explained that the notification Cooper had sent to the Union was not the proper procedure. He did not indicate what was the proper procedure in the circumstances. Cooper then described to Young his financial problems, to which Young responded that he was going about it in the wrong way. Cooper said that he could not help it, that he was low on finances, he had to make a change and he felt the notice he had given was okay. Young advised him that he was creating problems for both sides, that the Union would have to protest and would file unfair labor practice charges with the NLRB. He asked Cooper to abide by the collective-bargaining agreement but Cooper said he could no longer do so. The meeting ended without the problem being resolved. On August 7 the Union filed the charges which gave rise to this proceeding and on the following Monday, August 10, began picketing in front of the IBM plant to protest Respondent's unfair labor practices of terminating union employees, employing nonunion employees, and lowering wages below the scale set in the collective-bargaining agreement.

In effect, Cooper also withdrew Respondent from PDCA when he sent his July 24 letter to the Union. Although he did not specifically advise PDCA that Respondent was withdrawing from the association, PDCA Secretary Carl Radden received a copy of the July 24 letter to the Union. Around that same time Respondent ceased being a member by not paying dues, there being no prescribed protocol for terminating membership.

The July 24 letter to the Union was a forthright rejection of Respondent's collective-bargaining obligations. Respondent thereby reneged on the balance of the contract which by its own terms ran through March 31, 1982, and "from year to year thereafter unless either party shall serve written notice of their desire to alter, modify or terminate the Agreement by giving such written notice to the other party not less than sixty (60) calendar days prior to any expiration date of the Agreement."[3] Respondent's letter was more than 60 days prior to the expiration date. I find that the July 24 letter was within the prescribed notice period for terminating the then existing contract. However, it did not and, absent the consent of the other contracting party, could not operate to foreshorten the agreed-upon duration of that agreement. The July 24 letter was soon followed by Respondent's nonunion operations in early August in blatant violation of the contract. In their conversation at that time Business Representative Young urged Cooper to honor the contract, noting he had not used the proper procedure, that he was going about it the wrong way, and was creating problems for both sides. Cooper said he had no alternative because of his financial dilemma. But the availability of special negotiations in view of the circumstances was not suggested by either, although Young, who initiated the meeting, hinted at alternatives, and the option of negotiation must have been apparent to both. Apparently the only course which Cooper considered was the nonunion operation already launched, assertedly for financial reasons. The only alternative specifically voiced by Young, even considering Respondent's financial plight, was adherence to existing contract terms. In sum, after Respondent took the initiative in prematurely terminating the agreement, the Union presented Cooper with the opportunity, but did not press for, negotiations, an opportunity which Respondent let pass. As the party interested in change, it was Respondent's responsibility to seek a solution compatible with its bargaining obligations. Cooper failed to do so. He was not entitled to presume that an effort to bargain about Respondent's financial dilemma would have been futile. So far as this record shows, he never specifically asked the Union for relief.

I find that Respondent, by its July 24 letter to the Union terminating the bargaining relationship as of August 1, followed by its unilateral imposition of nonunion working conditions and its failures to abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement then in effect, failed to bargain collectively with the Union as required by Section 8(d) of the Act and thereby committed unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Marquis Elevator Co., supra.

By this conduct Respondent categorically refused to further recognize or bargain with the Union whether through group bargaining or as an individual employer. Cf. Spun-Jee Corp., 171 NLRB 557 (1968); U.S. Lingerie Corp., 170 NLRB 750 (1968). The General Counsel views Respondent's conduct as an untimely effort to withdraw from group bargaining, but that approach seems myopic. Cooper turned his back on any kind of bargaining. The abandonment of group bargaining is, therefore, immaterial to the finding of a violation of Section 8(a)(5). However, it does bear on the question of the continuing agency of PDCA to bind Respondent to the successor agreement. The General Counsel contends such agency continues and Respondent is now bound to the present group contract with the Union in the negotiation of which Respondent did not participate. Even though I find Respondent's obligation to bargain with the Union on request continues, I disagree that it is now bound to the terms of the current PDCA/union agreement.

The July 24 letter, although it failed to terminate the existing agreement on August 1 as Cooper intended, did serve to trigger termination on March 31, 1982, the anniversary date, pursuant to article X, section 1, of that agreement, and for that purpose was timely notice of intent to terminate. Withdrawal from group bargaining was a necessary consequence of the letter. In Retail Associates, Inc., 120 NLRB 388, 393–395 (1958), the Board, in announcing its standards for such withdrawal, noted that the right to withdraw is not unfettered and is limited by reasonable controls as to the time and manner of withdrawal. The intention to withdraw must be unequivocal, and exercised at an appropriate time. In the present matter Respondent's letter of July 24, a copy of which was provided to PDCA, together with Respondent's operation of a nonunion enterprise and its de facto resignation from PDCA by nonpayment of dues, unequivocally expressed an intention to permanently abandon bargaining through PDCA. Further, the timing of this abandonment satisfies the Board standard in view of the lack of any PDCA or contract requirements limiting advance withdrawal, the apparent willingness of Carl Radden, secretary and principal official of PDCA, to allow Respondent to drop out, and the absence of any pending negotiations at the time of withdrawal. Retail Associates also requires good faith of the withdrawing party, which Respondent cannot claim, Cooper having no intention of bargaining with the Union on any basis. Thus, the question of whether Respondent now remains bound by group bargaining, after termination of the prior union contract pursuant to the terms thereof and Respondent's withdrawal from group bargaining, seems to turn on the significance of Respondent's lack of a good-faith intent to continue bargaining as a single employer.

[3] The PDCA/union contract which followed thereafter, negotiated to go into effect April 1, 1982, limited this notice period to 15 days, that is, not less than 60 nor more than 75 days prior to the expiration date of the contract.

In Retail Associates the Board underscored the importance of stability in bargaining units. The Board has also long considered single employer units as well as multiemployer units to be appropriate for bargaining. In the present matter the bargaining unit alleged and admitted to be appropriate is a single-employer unit.[4] The description of that unit is part of the frame within which this case has been litigated. I find the alleged unit is appropriate. Additional circumstances for consideration are Respondent's history of financial difficulties, Respondent's current status before the bankruptcy court noted hereinafter, and whether, as a matter of labor relations policy, these matters are better addressed in group or in single-employer bargaining. Considering the above factors and, in particular, the time lapse between Respondent's withdrawal and the deadline designated in the contract for modification or termination, I conclude that, with the expiration of that agreement, Respondent ceased to be contractually bound and, therefore, is not now bound by the new agreement negotiated between PDCA and the Union for the period April 1, 1982, through March 31, 1983. I conclude that Respondent's duty to bargain subsequent to August 1, 1981, can be met by either multi- or single-employer bargaining. In this connection, it may be noted that PDCA has considered Respondent to be out of its bargaining group, apparently since August 1981. For its part, the Union has not specifically made a point of Respondent's abandonment of PDCA representation. Union charges which initiated these proceedings in August 1981 are aimed at cancellation of the contract rather than escape from group bargaining. Similarly, participation in this litigation has been in the context of the bargaining duties asserted in the complaint which, as noted above, are in terms of a single-employer unit consisting of Respondent's employees. By way of posthearing brief the General Counsel has shifted theory to include withdrawal from PDCA in the claimed violation and to seek a remedial order requiring Respondent to abide by the successor PDCA/union agreement effective April 1, 1982, which agreement differs from its predecessor. With matters in this posture, and considering that both the multi- and single-employer unit are appropriate, and that Respondent's withdrawal from PDCA occurred many months prior to negotiation of the successor contract and necessarily had less adverse impact on the stability of the multibargaining unit than if it had been attempted during negotiations and for that reason had been untimely,[5] I conclude that Respondent is obligated to bargain in the single-employer unit alleged and found appropriate herein even though it did not in good faith contemplate such bargaining when it withdrew recognition as of August 1, 1981. I am further constrained to so hold because it seems to me that Respondent's lack of good faith from August 1, 1981, until now has little bearing on the question of whether single- or multiemployer bargaining is the preferable tool for protecting Respondent's employees, given the particular economic circumstances presented here. See J. D. Candler Roofing Co., 158 NLRB 341 (1981).

D. Formation of the Partnership

As already noted, Edward Cooper is the sole stockholder and officer of Respondent Corporation and personally has made all business decisions for that entity. It is a one-man corporation. After August 1, as noted above, Respondent resumed working at IBM, apparently in the same business format as before. Although some of Edward Cooper's testimony suggests he was operating as an individual, it is clear the Corporation was not dissolved. The name remained the same. Edward Cooper continued as before, using his son as a foreman and employing several painters to perform the work. He indicated that on occasion he himself worked with his hands, as did his son, but I infer that the occasions on which Edward Cooper did so were infrequent, and he continued as the head of the enterprise.

Formation of Respondent Partnership did not come about suddenly. The Coopers, father and son, talked

[4] This uncontroverted portion of the complaint reads as follows:

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

All employees engaged in painting employed by Respondent at and out of its Lexington, Kentucky facility, but excluding all office clerical employees, guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[5] As noted in Retail Associates, supra at 395, "the timing of an attempted withdrawal from a multiemployer bargaining unit, as Board cases show, is an important lever of control in the sound discretion of the Board to ensure stability of such bargaining relationships. We would accordingly refuse to permit the withdrawal of an employer or a union from a duly established multiemployer bargaining unit, except upon adequate written notice given prior to the date set by the contract for modification, or to the agreed-upon date to begin the multiemployer negotiations."

about a partnership about the time of the July 24 letter to the Union but they formed the partnership much later. David Cooper placed the actual formation in November 1981. Edward Cooper did not testify as to the time the Partnership was formed other than to say it was subsequent to his notice to the Union. On the other hand, he testified that the Corporation took on no new business after August 1 and only concerned itself with completing preexisting contracts. Yet it is apparent that immediately after August 1 Respondent was engaged in performing newly acquired work at IBM, hired nonunion painters to perform the work, and used David Cooper as foreman to supervise them. In these circumstances, I do not credit Edward Cooper's testimony that the Corporation performed no new work after August 1. I find it continued in business with both old and new work until formation of the partnership in November. He testified he decided on a partnership with his son at a time when he had no business but felt he might get some, and that he started a new operation in order to make a living, both of them then working with their hands. The only time at which the evidence in the record indicates Respondent was without business was the end of July. In early August new business developed and there is no specific evidence indicating a total lack of business after that.

The one aspect in which Respondent's operation differed subsequent to its July 24 letter was its substitution of nonunion employees for union employees. The same type of painting work continued to be performed. Work at IBM continued. The same office and telephone were continued. The same office secretary was employed. David Cooper continued as foreman and Edward Cooper continued as head of the operation.

Change in managerial structure of the enterprise occurred only when the Partnership was formed in November. Prior thereto David Cooper had no participation in business decisions, had no access to the books and records, and was paid an hourly wage. Since formation of the Partnership he participates in partnership decisions, hires employees, writes checks on partnership bank accounts, buys materials with both check and cash, shares in profits on a basis of 60 percent to his father and 40 percent to himself, has access to the books and records, and supervises work on the jobs, working with tools himself when that is necessary. He also signs the payroll, assists in estimating jobs, and is privy to all expenditures. He now draws a salary rather than an hourly wage as previously.

The Partnership continues the business previously carried on by Respondent Corporation, including work at IBM. Neither the Corporation nor the Partnership is a member of PDCA. Edward Cooper testified that the operation of the enterprise continued in this same manner at the time of the hearing herein. On November 10 he informed Harry Sammons, the contracting administrator at IBM, of the formation of Respondent Partnership. He confirmed this the same day in a letter to Sammons on Respondent Corporation's letterhead which read as follows:

> Mr. Sammons:
> In reference to our phone conversation on 11-10-81, we submit the following information.
> Beginning 11-17-81 we have formed a new company under the name Cooper & Cooper Painting which will be operated as a partnership. The principal stockholders will be Edward Cooper as President and William Cooper (my son) as secretary. All new business beginning that date should be directed to Cooper & Cooper Painting.
> Edward Cooper Painting Inc. will terminate as of 11-17-81.

The complaint alleges that Respondent Partnership was established as a subordinate instrument and a disguised continuation of Respondent Corporation and, further, that the Corporation and Partnership are alter egos and a single employer.[6] I agree. I base this on the continuing role of Edward Cooper as the major managerial figure in both, the continuing operation of the same business from the same location, performing the same sort of work for the same class of customers and for one specific customer in particular, IBM. David Cooper as a partner continues to perform all of the functions he performed under the Corporation with the addition of the greater managerial functions noted above. The one office employee remains the same and it is at least inferrable that the working painters remain substantially the same. In this latter connection, it should be noted that, although Respondent Corporation ceased employing union painters at the end of July and a complete changeover to nonunion painters occurred in early August, there is no evidence respecting turnover in the staff from that point forward. In the circumstances the probabilities are, and I find, that Respondent continued to use substantially the same group of employees after formation of the Partnership. Being a continuation of the same enterprise, the Partnership is, for labor relations purposes, legally obligated to the same extent as the Corporation, including the proscriptions of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. Century Printing Co.; 242 NLRB 659, 666-667 (1967).

E. The Bankruptcy Proceeding

On December 4 Respondent Corporation, over the signature of Edward Cooper as president, petitioned the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky for relief as a voluntary debtor in bankruptcy under Chapter 11, Title 11 of the United States Code. That matter is now pending. On May 28, 1982, the [6] The General also asserts that the Partnership is a successor to the Corporation but it is unnecessary to treat that question because it is subsumed in the alter ego finding.

Board's Regional Director for Region 9 filed with the court a proof of multiple claims totaling $120,296 for wages, salaries, or commissions covering claims of backpay due employees to June 1, 1982. On June 11, 1982, the Corporation as debtor-in-possession filed with the court its objection to the Board's proof of claim. On May 17, 1982, Edward Cooper (under the name Henry Edward Cooper) as an individual filed a petition in the same court for relief as a voluntary debtor in bankruptcy under Chapter 7, Title 11 of the United States Code. That proceeding is also pending.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The unfair labor practices of Respondent set forth in section II, above, occurring in connection with the operations described in section I, above, have a close and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. PDCA (Blue Grass Chapter of Painting and Decorating Contractors of America) is an association of employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act which, on behalf of those employers, bargains collectively with various labor organizations, including the Union herein.

2. Respondent Corporation (Edward Cooper Painting, Inc.) and Respondent Partnership (Cooper and Cooper Painting) are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

3. Respondent Corporation and Respondent Partnership (collectively referred to herein as Respondent) are alter egos and a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

4. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

5. In terminating the employment after August 1, 1981, of Walter Young Jr., and in failing to employ him thereafter when work became available, Respondent discriminated against him because of his union affiliation, discouraged membership in the Union, and engaged in unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

6. All Respondent's employees engaged in painting at and out of its Lexington, Kentucky facility, but excluding all office clerical employees, guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

7. At all material times the Union, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in the unit described above.

8. On July 24, 1981, Respondent withdrew recognition of the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above and since then has failed and refused to so recognize and bargain with the Union or to adhere to the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union then in effect. Respondent thereby failed and refused, and is failing and refusing, to bargain collectively in good faith with the Union and has been, and is, engaging in unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

9. The above unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3), (5), and (1) of the Act, I recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. I recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer Walter Young Jr. immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other benefits and privileges, and that he be made whole for any loss of earnings incurred as a result of being terminated as of August 1, 1981, with backpay to be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and with interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). I further recommend that Respondent be required to preserve and make available to Board agents, on request, all pertinent records and data necessary in analyzing and determining whatever backpay or other amounts may be due, and further, that Respondent be required to expunge from its records or files any reference to the termination of David Young Jr.

Inasmuch as Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union as of August 1, 1981, and abrogated the then existing collective-bargaining agreement, I shall order that it cease its refusal to recognize the Union, that it abide by that agreement, and that it take certain affirmative action to recognize and bargain with the Union and honor that contract. I shall order Respondent to recognize the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the bargainng unit described above, to rescind or revoke its unilateral abandonment of the terms and conditions of employment provided for in that agreement and to enforce the terms and conditions thereof retroactively to August 1, 1981, until March 31, 1982, the date on which that agreement by its terms expired as a result of the notice of termination by Respondent to the Union on July 24, 1981. I shall also order Respondent, on request, to bargain in good faith with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees.

Respondent will be ordered to make whole the employees in the appropriate unit found above for any loss of wages or other benefits they may have suffered as a result of Respondent's abrogation of the agreement in effect at that time, with interest as provided for in Florida Steel Corp., supra.[7]

Respondent will also be ordered to make those payments which should have been made to the Union's health and welfare trust fund, and the education fund. Any interest applicable to such fund payments shall be paid in accordance with the criteria set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979); and see Fox Painting Co., 263 NLRB 437 (1982). I shall also order Respondent to reimburse the Union with interest for loss of dues which the Union would have received pursuant to the dues-checkoff provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement which Respondent attempted to abrogate as of August 1, 1981. Fox Painting Co., supra. In addition, Respondent will reimburse any unit employee for premiums which an employee may have paid to a third-party insurance company for medical coverage and for any medical bills any employee paid directly to a health care provider that said collective-bargaining agreement policy would have covered. Fox Painting Co., supra; Angelus Block Co., 250 NLRB 868 (1980). Respondent's acts in this matter indicate a proclivity to engage in unfair labor practices and, accordingly, the broad injunctive relief is appropriate. See Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

The recommended Order will run against "Respondent, its agents, successors, and assigns," the normal wording of Board orders. The order is designed to include within its reach receivers, trustees, and debtors in possession functioning pursuant to the bankruptcy laws of the United States. See Section 2(1) and (2) of the Act. See also Imperial Hospital, 257 NLRB 581 (1981); Nathan Yorke, 259 NLRB 819 (1981). Even though such a functionary is a distinct person for bankruptcy purposes, it is subject to the Act as an employer or the successor of an employer. Application of the Act does not automatically cease upon the filing of a petition in bankruptcy by an employer. Board orders are binding on successors in charge of an enterprise for reasons other than evasion of the Act because under Section 10(c) of the Act, the Board is charged with effectuating the policies of the Act. Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168, 176, 177 (1973).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]
